This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.

+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.

+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.

+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at `http://books.google.com/` book belongs to a collection ewisiana from the library of s F. Peck. A portion of this lection is kept together as a t and assigned to this location

the Deposit Library.

HARVARD COLLEGE LIBRARY

ABAELLINO,

THE

BRAVO OF VENICE.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN,

BY M. G. LEWIS.

What black magician conjures up this fiend?—
What! do ye tremble? are ye all afraid?
Alas! I blame ye not, for ye are mortal,
And mortal eyes cannot endure the Devil.
Avaunt, thou dreadful minister of hell!

Shakespeare

Stereotyped by D. Watson, Woodstock.

WOODSTOCK, VT.
PRINTED BY DAVID WATSON.
1830.

*667 - 187

HARVARD UNIVERSITY LIBRARY
JUN 24 1969

CONTENTS.

BOOK I.

		Page.
Chap.	I.—Venice	5
	II.—The Banditti	10
	III.—The Trial of Strength	14
	IV.—The Daggers	20
	V.—Solitude	26
	VI.—Rosabella, the Doge's lovely Neice	30
	VII.—The Bravo's Bride	36
	VIII.—The Conspiracy	39
	IX.—Cynthia's Dwelling	49

BOOK II.

Chap.	I.—The Birthday	57
	II.—The Florentine Stranger	68
	III.—More Confusion	77
	IV.—The Violet	82
	V.—The Assassin	92
	VI.—The two greatest Men in Venice	97

BOOK III.

Chap.	I.—The Lovers	105
	II.—A dangerous Promise	111
	III.—The Midnight Meeting	123
	IV.—The decisive Day	128
	V.—The Clock strikes five!	134
	VI.—Apparitions	141
	VII.—Conclusion	158

ABÆLLINO,

THE

BRAVO OF VENICE.

BOOK I.

Chapter I.—Venice.

IT was evening. Multitudes of light uds, partially illumined by the moon-ams, overspread the horizon, and through em floated the full moon in tranquil masty, while her splendor was reflected by ery wave of the Adriatic Sea. All was ished around; gently was the water riped by the night wind; gently did the night
ind sigh through the colonnades of Venice.
It was midnight—and still sat a stranger,
olitary and sad, on the border of the great anal. Now with a glance he measured the attlements and proud towers of the city;
nd now he fixed his melancholy eyes upon he waters with a vacant stare. At length
e spoke:

"Wretch that I am! Whither shall I go?
Here sit I in Venice, and what would it avail
o wander further? What will become of he? All now slumber save myself! T

Doge rests on his couch of down; the gar's head presses his straw pillow; bu
me there is no bed except the cold, d earth! There is no gondolier so wretc but he knows where to find work by and shelter by night—while I—while Oh! dreadful is the destiny of which I made the sport!"

He began to examine for the twent
time the pockets of his tattered garment

"No! not one paolo, by heavens!—a hunger almost to death!"

He unsheathed his sword; he waved i the moonshine, and sighed as he marked glittering of the steel.

"No, no! my old and true compan thou and I must never part! Mine t shalt remain, though I starve for it!— was not that a golden time when Val gave thee to me, and when as she threw belt over my shoulders, I kissed thee and V ria?' She has deserted us for another wo but thou and I will never part in this."

He wiped away a drop which hung u
his eyelid.

"Psha! 'twas not a tear! the night win
sharp and bitter, and makes the eyes wa
but as for tears—absurd! my weeping d are over!"

And as he spoke, the unfortunate (for s
by his discourse and situation he appea to be) dashed his forehead against the ear
d his lips were already unclosed to cu

[illegible] which gave him being, when he denly seemed to recollect himself. He ed his head on his elbow, and sang urnfully the burden of a song which had n delighted his childhood in the castle is ancestors.

"Right!" he said to himself; "were I to k under the weight of my destiny, I should myself no longer."

At that moment he heard a rustling at no at distance. He looked around, and in an acent street, which the moon faintly en-htened, he perceived a tall figure wrap-l in a cloak, pacing slowly backwards and wards.

"'Tis the hand of God, which hath guided n hither—Yes! I'll—I'll beg! Better to y the beggar in Venice, than the villain Naples; for the beggar's heart may beat ly, though covered by rags."

He said, sprang from the ground, and hased towards the adjoining street. Just as entered it at one end, he perceived anor person advancing through the other;
whose approach the first was no sooner
are, than he hastily retired into the sha-
v of a piazza, as if anxious to conceal self.

"What can this mean?" thought our penant. "Is yon eaves-dropper one of death's licensed ministers? Has he received the aining fee of some impatient heir, who nts to possess the wealth of the unlucky

knave who comes strolling along yonder careless and unconscious?—be not so co dent, honest friend! I am at your elbow."

He retired further into the shade, and lently and slowly drew near the lurker, w stirred not from his place. The strang had already passed them by, when the c cealed villain sprang suddenly upon him, a raised his right hand in which a poni was gleaming; but before he could give t blow, was felled to the earth by the arm the mendicant.

The stranger turned hastily towards the the Bravo started up and fled; the begg smiled.

"How now?" cried the stranger; 'wh does all this mean?"

"Oh! 'tis a mere jest, Seignior, whi has only preserved your life."

"What? My life? How so?"

"The honest gentleman who has just t ken to his heels, stole behind you with tr cat-like caution, and had already raised h dagger when I saw him.—You owe yo life to me, and the service is richly wor one little piece of money! Give me so alms, Seignior, for on my soul I am hungr thirsty, cold—"

"Hence, scurvy companion! I know y and your tricks too well. This is all a c certed scheme between you, a design up my purse, an attempt to procure both m ney and thanks under the lame pretence aving saved me from an assassin.—Go, felow, go! practise these dainty devices on he Doge's credulity, if you will; but with Buonarotti you stand no chance, believe me."

The wretched, starving beggar stood like ne petrified, and gazed on the taunting tranger.

"No; as I have a soul to save, Seignior, 'tis
o lie that I tell you; 'tis the plain truth;
ave compassion, or I die this night of huner."

"Begone this instant, I say, or by heav-
n"—

The unfeeling man here drew out a con-ealed pistol, and pointed it at his preserver.

"Merciful heaven! and is it thus that serices are acknowledged in Venice?"

"The watch is at no great distance; I need nly raise my voice, and—

"Hell and confusion! Do you take me for robber then?"

"Make no noise, I tell you! Be quiet, you ad better—

"Hark you, Seignior! Buonarotti is your me, I think? I will write it down, as benging to the second scoundrel with whom have met in Venice!"

He paused for a moment; then continuing a dreadful voice,—"And when," said he, hou, Buonarotti, shalt hereafter hear the ame of ABÆLLINO—tremble!

Abællino turned away, and left the hard earted Venetian.

CHAP. II.—The Banditti.

AND now rushed the unfortunate wi
through the streets of Venice: he raile fortune; he laughed and cursed by tu
yet sometimes he suddenly stood still, se ed as pondering on some great and wor ous enterprise, and then again rushed wards as if hastening to its execution.

Propped against a column of the Sig ria, he counted over the whole sum of misfortunes. His wandering eye-balls se ed to seek comfort; but they found it no

"Fate," he at length exclaimed in a oxysm of despair, "Fate has condemned to be either the wildest of adventurers
one, at the relation of whose crimes world must shudder! To astonish is destiny: Rosalvo can know no medi
Rosalvo can never act like common me
Is it not the hand of fate which has led hither? Who could have ever dreamed,
the son of the richest lord in Naples sh have depended for a beggar's alms on tian charity! I—I, who feel myself po
ed of strength of body and energy of so for executing the most daring deeds—be me creeping in rags through the stre
this inhospitable city, and torturing my
in vain to discover some means by wh
may rescue life from the jaws of fa
Those men whom my munificence nou

, who at my table bathed their worthless ils in the choicest wine of Cyprus, and itted themselves with every kind of deli- cy which the globe's four quarters could pply, those very men now deny to my cessity even a miserable crust of mouldy ead.—Oh! that is dreadful cruel! Cruel men! cruel of Heaven!"

He paused; he folded his arms and sighed. "Yet will I bear it! I will submit to my tiny! I will traverse every path, and go rough every degree of human wretched- ss; and whatever may be my fate, I will still myself, and whatever may be my e, I will still act greatly!—Away then th the Count Rosalvo, whom once all ples idolized; now—now am I the beggar ellino! A beggar?—that name stands last the scale of worldly rank, but first in the s of the famishing, the outcast, and the worthy."

Something rustled near him.—Abællino ed around. He was aware of the Bravo om he had struck to the ground that ht, and whom two companions of a simi- stamp had now joined. As they advan- , they cast inquiring glances around m. They were in search of some one.

"It is of thee that they are in search," said ellino; then advanced a few paces, and istled.

The ruffians stood still—they whispered ether, and seemed to be undecided.

Abællino whistled a second time.

"'Tis he!" he could hear one of th say distinctly; and in a moment after th advanced slowly towards him.

Abællino kept his place, but unsheath his sword. The three unknown (they w masked) stopped a few paces from him.

"How now, fellow?" quoth one of the
"what is the matter? why stand you your guard?"

Abællino.—It is as well that you sho
be made to keep your distance, for I k
you; you are certain honest gentlemen, w live by taking away the lives of others.

First Ruffian.—Was not your whistl addressed to us?

Abællino.—It was.

Ruffian.—And what would you of us?

Abællino.—Hear me! I am a misera wretch, and starving; give me an alms of your booty!

Ruffian.—An alms? ha! ha! ha! By soul, that is whimsical!—Alms from us deed!—Oh! by all means! No doubt, y shall have alms a plenty.

Abællino.—Or else give me fifty sequ
and I'll bind myself to your service t shall have worked out my debt.

Ruffian.—Aye! and pray then who you be?

Abællino.—A starving wretch, the rep lic holds none more miserable. Such a at present; but hereafter—I have powe

knaves—this arm could pierce an heart, though guarded by three breastplates; this eye, though surrounded by Egyptian darkness, could still see to stab sure.

Ruffian.—Why then did you strike me down even now?

Abællino.—In the hope of being paid for it; but though I saved his life, the scoundrel gave me not a single ducat.

Ruffian.—No? so much the better. But hark ye, comrade! are you sincere?

Abællino.—Despair never lies.

Ruffian.—Slave, shouldst thou be a traitor—

Abællino.—My heart would be within reach of your hands, and your daggers would be as sharp as now.

The three dangerous companions again whispered among themselves for a few moments, after which they returned their daggers into the sheath.

"Come on then," said one of them; "follow us to our home. It were unwise to talk over certain matters in the open street."

"I follow you," was Abællino's answer; "but tremble, should any one of you dare to treat me as a foe.—Comrade, forgive me that I gave your ribs somewhat too hard a squeeze just now; I will be your sworn brother in recompense."

"We are on honor," cried the banditti with one voice; "no harm shall happen to you: he who does you an injury, shall be to as a foe. A fellow of your humor suits us well: follow us, and fear not."

And on they went, Abællino marching between two of them. Frequent were the looks of suspicion, which he cast around him; but no ill design was perceptible in the banditti. They guided him onwards, till they reached a canal, loosened a gondola, placed themselves in it, and rowed till they had gained the most remote quarter of Venice. They landed; treaded several bye-streets, and at length knocked at the door of a house of no inviting appearance. It was opened by a young woman, who conducted them into a plain but comfortable chamber. Many were the looks of surprise and inquiry which she cast on the bewildered, half-pleased, half-anxious Abællino, who knew not whither he had been conveyed, and still thought it unsafe to confide entirely in the promises of the banditti.

Chap. III.—The trial of strength.

Scarcely were the bravos seated, when Cynthia (for that was the young woman's name) was again summoned to the door; and the company was now increased by two new comers, who examined their unknown guest from head to foot.

"Now then," cried one of those who had conducted Abællino to this respectable society, "let us see what you are like."

As he said this, he raised a burning lamp from the table, and the light of its flame was thrown full upon Abællino's countenance.

"Lord forgive me my sins!" screamed Cynthia; "out upon him! what an ugly hound it is!"

She turned hastily round, and hid her face with her hands. Dreadful was the look with which Abællino repaid her compliment.

"Knave," said one of the banditti, "nature's own hand has marked you out for an assassin—come, pray thee, be frank, and tell us how thou hast contrived so long to escape the gibbet? In what jail didst thou leave thy last fetters? Or from what galley hast thou taken thy departure, without staying to say adieu?"

Abællino folded his arms.

"If I be such as you describe," said he with an air of authority, and in a voice which made his hearers tremble, "'tis for me all the better. Whatever may be my future mode of life, Heaven can have no right to find fault with it, since it was for that it formed and fitted me."

The five bravos stepped aside, and consulted together; the subject of their conference is easy to be divined. In the meanwhile Abællino remained quiet and indiffe rent to what was passing

After a few minutes they again approa
ed him: one, whose countenance was most ferocious, and whose form exhibi
the greatest marks of muscular streng advanced a few paces before the rest, addressed Abællino as follows:

"Hear me, comrade. In Venice th exist but five banditti; you see them be you: wilt thou be the sixth? Doubt thou wilt find sufficient employment.
name is Matteo, and I am the father of band: that sturdy fellow with the red lo is called Baluzzo; he, whose eyes twinl
like a cat's, is Tomaso; an arch knave promise you! 'twas Petrino, whose bo
you handled so roughly to-night; and y thick-lipped Colossus, who stands next Cynthia, is named Struzzo. Now then y know us all; and since you are a pennyl devil, we are willing to incorporate you our society; but we must first be assur
that you mean honestly by us."

Abællino smiled, or rather grinned, a murmured hoarsely, "I am starving."

"Answer, fellow! Dost thou mean h estly by us?"

"That must the event decide."

"Mark me, knave; the first suspicion treachery costs you your life. Take shelt in the Doge's palace, and girdle yours round with all the power of the republi though clasped in the Doge's arms, a protected by an hundred cannons; st

ould we murder you! Fly to the high tar; press the crucifix to your bosom; and ven at mid-day—still would we murder ou. Think on this well, fellow, and for-et not we are a banditti!"

"You need not tell me that; but give me me food, and then I'll prate with you as ng as you please. At present I am starv-g! Four and twenty hours have elapsed ce I last tasted nourishment."

Cynthia now covered a small table with r best provisions, and filled several silver oblets with delicious wine.

"If one could but look at him without isgust," murmured Cynthia; "if he had t the appearance of something human! atan must certainly have appeared to his other while she was big with him; and ence came her child into the world with ch a frightful countenance! Ugh! It's a absolute mask; only that I never saw a ask so hideous!"

Abællino heeded her not: he placed him-elf at the table, and ate and drank as if he ould have satisfied himself for the next six onths. The banditti eyed him with looks f satisfaction, and congratulated each other n so valuable an acquisition.

If the reader is curious to know what this ame Abællino is like, he must figure to himself a stout young fellow, whose limbs perhaps might have been thought not ill-ormed, had not the most horrible con-

nance that ever was invented by a caric
rist, or that Milton could have adapte
the ugliness of his fallen angels, enti
marred the advantages of his person. Bl and shining, but long and straight, his flew wildly about his brown neck and ye face. His mouth was so wide that his g and discoloured teeth were visible, a kind of convulsive twist which scarcely was at rest, had formed its expression an eternal grin. His eye (for he had
one) was sunk deep into his head, and l
more than the white of it was visible;
even that little was overshadowed by protrusion of his dark and bushy eye-br
In the union of his features were found lected in one hideous assemblage, all most coarse and uncouth traits which had been exhibited singly in wooden and the observer was left in doubt, whe
this repulsive physiognomy expressed pidity of intellect, or maliciousness of he or whether it implied them both togeth

"Now then I am satisfied!" roared Al
lino, and dashed the still-full goblet
the ground; "speak! what would you k of me? I am ready to give you answers.

"The first thing," replied Matteo,
first thing necessary is to give us a proo
your strength, for this is of material imp tance in our undertakings. Are you g at wrestling?"

"I know not: try me."

ynthia, remove the table. Now then, lino, which of us will you undertake? n amongst us dost think thou canst k down as easy as yon poor dabbler in rt, Petrino?"

Which of you?" cried Abællino; "all of together, and half a dozen more such ıl scoundrels!" And he sprang from eat, threw his sword on the table, and ured the strength of his antagonist with gle eye.

he banditti burst into a loud fit of hter.

Now then," cried Abællino fiercely; w then for the trial! Why come you on?"

Fellow," replied Matteo, "take my ad- ; try first what you can do with me e, and learn what sort of men you have ıanage. Think you we are marrowless s, or delicate Seigniors, who waste their ngth in the embrace of harlots?"

bællino answered him with a scornful h—Matteo became furious: his com- ions shouted aloud and clapped their ds.

To business!" said Abællino; "I'm now he right humor for sport! Look to your- es, my lads!" And in the same instant he llected his forces together, threw the antic Matteo over his head as if he had n an infant, knocked Strazzo down on the ht hand, and Petrino on the left, tumble Tomaso to the end of the room, head heels, and stretched. Baluzzo without mation upon the neighboring benches.

Three minutes elapsed, ere the sul bravos could recover themselves; loud ted Abællino, while the astonished Cy gazed and trembled at the terrible ex tion.

"By the blood of St. Januarius," Matteo, at length rubbing his battered j "the fellow is our master. Cynthia, care to give him our best chamber."

"He must have made a compact wit devil," grumbled Tomaso, and forced dislocated wrist back into its socket.

No one seemed inclined to hazard a cond trial of strength. The night wa advanced, or rather the grey of the mor already was visible over the sea. The ditti separated, and each retired to chamber.

CHAP. IV.—The Daggers.

ABÆLLINO, this Italian Hercules, all t ble as he appeared to be, was not lo member of this society, before his com ions felt towards him sentiments of the unbounded esteem. All loved, all va him for his extraordinary talents for a vo's trade, to which he seemed peculia adapted, not only by his wonderful stren of body, but by the readiness of his wit, and his never failing presence of mind.—Even Cynthia was inclined to feel some little affection for him, but he really was too ugly.

Matteo (as Abællino was given to understand) was the captain of this dangerous troop. He was one who carried villany to the highest pitch of refinement, incapable of fear, quick and crafty, and troubled with less conscience than an English financier. The booty and price of blood which his associates brought in daily, were always delivered up to him: he gave each man his share, and retained no larger portion for himself than was allotted to the others. The catalogue of those whom he had dispatched into the other world, was already too long for him to have repeated it: many names had slipped his memory; but his greatest pleasure in hrs hours of relaxation, was to relate such of these murderous anecdotes as he still remembered, in the benevolent intention of inspiring his hearers with a desire to follow his example. His weapons were kept separate from the rest, and occupied a whole apartment. Here were to be found daggers of a thousand different fashions, with guards and without them; two, three, and four edged. Here were stored air-guns, pistols and blunderbusses; poisons of various kinds, and operating in various ways; garments fit for every possible disguise, whether to personate the monk, the Jew, or the mendicant, the soldier, the senator, or th gondolier.

One day he summoned Abællino to atte
him in his armory.

"Mark me," said he, "thou wilt turn o
a brave fellow, that I can see already.
is now time that you should earn that bre
for yourself, which hitherto you have ow to our bounty.—Look! here hast thou dagger of the finest steel; you must char
for its use by the inch. If you plunge only one inch deep into the bosom of his fo your employer must reward you with on one sequin; if two inches, with ten sequin
if three, with twenty; if the whole dagge
you may then name your own price.—He is next a glass poniard; whomsoever th pierces, that man's death is certain.—As soo
as the blow is given, you must break th
dagger in the wound; the flesh will clo
over the point which has been broken off
and which will keep its quarters till the da
of resurrection.—Lastly, observe this meta ic dagger; its cavity conceals a subtle poison which, whenever you touch this spring
will immediately infuse death into the vein of him whom the weapon's point hat wounded.—Take these daggers: in givin
them I present you with a capital capable o bring home to you the most heavy and most precious interest."

Abællino received the instruments o
death; but his hand shook as it grasped them

"Possessed of such unfailing weapons, of what immense sums must your robberies have made you master!"

"Scoundrel!" interrupted Matteo, frowning and offended, "among us robbery is unknown. What? dost take us for common plunderers, for mere thieves, cut-purses, house-breakers, and villains of that low, miserable stamp?"

"Perhaps what you wish me to take you for is something worse; for to speak openly, Matteo, villains of that stamp are contented with plundering a purse or a casket, which can easily be filled again; but that which we take from others, is a jewel which a man never has but once, and which, once stolen, can never be replaced. Are we not then a thousand times more atrocious plunderers?"

"By the house at Loretto, I think you have a mind to moralize, Abællino?"

"Hark ye, Matteo, only one question; at the day of judgment, which think you will hold his head the highest, the thief or the assassin?"

"Ha! ha! ha!"

"Think not, that Abællino speaks thus from want of resolution. Speak but the word, and I murder half the senators of Venice; but still—"

"Fool! know, the bravo must be above crediting the nurse's antiquated tales of vice and virtue. What is virtue? what is vice? nothing but such things as forms of government, customs, manners, and education made sacred; and that which men are to make honorable at one time, it is in power to make dishonorable at anot whenever the humor takes them: had the senate forbidden us to give opini freely respecting the politics of Venice, t

would have been nothing wrong in gi such opinions; and were the senate to clare that it is right to give such opinie that which is to-day thought a crime, wo
be thought meritorious to-morrow—
pr'ythee, let us have no more of such do as these. We are men, as much as the D and his senators, and have reason, as m
as they have, to lay down the law of ri and wrong, and decree what shall be v
and what shall be virtue."

Abællino laughed—Matteo proceed with increased animation:

"Perhaps you will tell me, our trade
dishonorable! and what, then, is the thi called honor? 'Tis a word, an empty sou
a mere fantastic creature of the imagi
tion!—Ask, as you traverse some unfreque
ed street, in what honor consists?—the u rer will answer, 'To be honorable is to rich; and he has most honor, who can he up the greatest quantity of sequins.' '
no means,' cries the voluptuary; 'hon consists in being beloved by every handso woman, and finding no virtue proof again
your attacks.' 'How mistaken!' interrup

general; 'to conquer whole cities, to troy whole armies, to ruin whole provin—that indeed brings real honor!' The n of learning places his renown in the mber of pages which he has either writ- or read; the tinker in the number of s and kettles which he has made or ded; the nun in the number of good gs which she has done, or bad things ich she has resisted; the coquette, in the of her admirers; the republic, in the ent of her provinces: and thus, my friend, ry one thinks that honor consists in ething different from the rest. And y, then, should not the bravo think, that or consists in reaching the perfection of trade, and in guiding a dagger to the rt of an enemy with unerring aim?"

By my life, 'tis a pity, Matteo, that you ld be a bravo; the schools have lost an ellent teacher of philosophy!"

Do you think so?—Why, the fact is thus, llino—I was educated in a monastery: father was a dignified prelate in Lucca, my mother a nun of the Ursuline order, tly respected for her chastity and devo- . Now, Seignior, it was thought fitting I should apply closely to my studies; father, good man, would fain have made light of the church; but I soon found, I was better qualified for an incen- ry's torch. I followed the bent of my ius, yet count I not my studies thrown away, since they taught me more philos phy than to tremble at phantoms creat

by my own imagination. Follow my exa ple, friend, and so farewell."

CHAP. V.—Solitude.

ABÆLLINO had already passed six wee in Venice, and yet (either from want of o portunity, or of inclination) he had suffer
his daggers to remain idle in their sheath
This proceeded partly from his not being yet sufficiently acquainted with the windin
and turns, the bye lanes and private alleys
the town; and partly because he had hither found no customers whose murderous desig
srood in need of his helping hand.

This want of occupation was irksome
him in the extreme; he panted for actio
and was condemned to indolence.

With a melancholy heart did he roa
through Venice, and number every step wi
a sigh. He frequented the public place
the taverns, gardens, and every scene whic
was dedicated to amusement; but no whe
could he find what he sought—tranquillit

One evening he had loitered beyond t
other visitants in a public garden, situat
on one of the most beautiful of the Veneti islands. He strolled from arbor to arbo threw himself down on the sea-shore, an watched the play of the waves, as the rled in the moon-shine

"Four years ago," said he with a sigh, just such an heavenly evening it was, that stole from Valeria's lips the first kiss, and eard from Valeria's lips for the first time he avowal that she loved me."

He was silent, and abandoned himself to e melancholy recollections that thronged efore his mind's eye.

Every thing around him was so calm—so silent! not a single zephyr sighed among he blades of grass; but a storm raged in the reast of Abællino.

"Four years ago could I have believed hat a time would come when I should play he part of a bravo in Venice! O! where are hey flown, the golden hopes and plans of lory, which smiled upon me in the happy ays of my youth? I am a bravo—to be a eggar were to be something better.

"When my good old father, in the enthuasm of paternal vanity, so oft threw his m around my neck, and cried, 'My boy, ou wilt render the name of Rosalvo glous:'—God, as I listened, how was my lood on fire!—What thought I not, what t I not, what that was good and great did not promise myself to do!—The father is ad, and the son is—a Venetian bravo.—hen my preceptors praised and admired , and, carried away by the warmth of heir feelings, clapped my shoulder, and claimed, 'Count, thou wilt immortalize he ancient race of Rosalvo!'—Ha! in those blessed moments of a sweet delirium, h

bright and beauteous stood futurity bef
me,—when, happy in the performance
some good deed, I returned home, and s Valeria hasten to receive me with open ar and when, while she clasped me to her som, I heard her whisper, 'Oh! who co
forbear to love the great Rosalvo?'. . . . .
God! oh, God! Away, away, glorious sions of the past! To look on you dri me mad!"

He was again silent; he bit his lip in fu raised one emaciated hand to heaven, a struck his forehead violently with the oth

"An assassin—the slave of cowards a rascals—the ally of the greatest villa whom the Venetian sun ever shone upo
Such is now the great Rosalvo!—Fie!—o fie on't!—And yet to this wretched lot h fatality condemned me."

Suddenly he sprang from the ground
ter a long silence; his eyes sparkled; his co
tenance changed; he drew his breath easi

"Yes! by Heaven, yes! great as Cou Rosalvo that can I be no longer; but fro being great as a Venetian bravo, what pr vents me?—Souls in bliss!" he exclaime and sank on his knee, while he raised h folded hands to heaven, as if about to pr nounce the most awful oath, "Spirit of m father! Spirit of Valeria! I will not becom unworthy of you! Hear me, if your ghost are permitted to wander near me, hear m r, that the Bravo shall not disgrace his n, nor render vain the hopes which ied you in the bitterness of death! No!

as I live, I will be the only dealer in miserable trade, and posterity shall be pelled to honor that name, which my ns shall render illustrious."
e bowed his forehead, till it touched arth, and his tears flowed plenteously.
conceptions swelled his soul: he dwelt vondrous views, till their extent bewil-
d his brain. Yet another hour elapsed,
he sprang from the earth to realize them!
will enter into no compact against hunature with five miserable cut-throats.
ie will I make the republic tremble;
before eight days are flown, these mur-us knaves shall swing on a gibbet. Ve-shall no longer harbour five banditti;
and one only, shall inhabit here, and one shall beard the Doge himself; shall h over right and over wrong, and, acing as he judges, shall reward or punish.
re eight days are flown, the state shall urified from the presence of these out-of humanity, and then shall I stand
e! Then must every villain in Venice, hitherto has kept the daggers of my anions in employment, have recourse
e; then shall I know the names and persons of all those cowardly murder-of all those illustrious profligates, with whom Matteo and his companions ca

the price of blood. And then, Ab Abællino! that is the name! Hear, Y hear it and tremble!"

Intoxicated with the wildness of his
he rushed out of the garden; he sum a gondolier, threw himself into the and hastened to the dwelling of Cy where the inhabitants already were in the arms of sleep.

CHAP. VI.—Rosabella, the Doge's lovely

"Hark, comrade," said Matteo th morning to Abællino, "to-day tho make the first step in our profession."

"To-day," hoarsely murmured Ab
"and on whom am I show my skill?"

"Nay, to say truth, 'tis but a woma
one must not give too difficult a task young beginner. I will myself acco you; and see how you conduct yours
this first trial."

"Hum!" said Abællino, and me
Matteo with his eyes from head to foo

"To-day, about four o'clock, thou follow me to Dolabella's gardens whic situated on the south side of Venice must both be disguised, you understand these gardens are excellent baths—and using these baths, the Doge's niece, lovely Rosabella of Corfu, frequently v

nt attendants. And then—you con-me?"
id you will accompany me?"
will be a spectator of your first adven-
'tis thus I deal by every one."
id how many inches deep must I plunge
gger?"
o the hilt, boy, to the very hilt! Her is required, and the payment will be ely; Rosabella in the grave, we are for life."
ery other point was soon adjusted.—
was now past, the clock in the neigh-ig church of the Benedictines struck and Matteo and Abællino were already

hey arrived at the gardens of Dolabella,
h that day was unusually crowded. Ev-hady avenue was thronged with people
th sexes; every arbor was occupied by persons most distinguished in Venice;
ery corner sighed love-sick couples, as waited for the wished approach of twi-
; and on every side did strains of vocal instrumental music pour their harmony
he enchanted ear.
bællino mingled with the crowd. A respectable looking peruke concealed epulsive ugliness of his features; he im-
d the walk and manners of a gouty old
, and supported himself on a crutch, as valked slowly through the assembly.—
habit richly embroidered, procured for him universally a good reception, and n

scrupled to enter into conversation wit respecting the weather, the commerce republic, or the designs of its enemies;
on no one of these subjects was Ab
found incapable of sustaining the disco

By these means, he soon contrived to intelligence that Rosabella was certain the gardens, how she was habited, an what quarter he was most likely to find

Thither he immediately bent his co
and hard at his heels followed Matteo.

Alone, and in the most retired arbor Rosabella of Corfu, the fairest maid-in ice.

Abællino drew near the arbor: he tott
as he passed its entrance, like one oppr with sudden faintness, and attracted R bella's attention.

"Alas! alas!" cried he, "is there no
at hand who will take compassion on infirmity of a poor old man?"

The Doge's fair niece quitted the a hastily, and flew to give assistance to sufferer.

"What ails you, my good father?"
inquired in a melodious voice, and wi
look of benevolent anxiety.

Abællino pointed towards the arbor; R
bella led him in, and placed him on a se turf.

"God reward you, lady!" stamme
Abællino faintly; he raised his eyes—t

Rosabella's, and a blush crimsoned his e cheeks.
Rosabella stood in silence before the disised assassin, and trembled with tender
ncern for the old man's illness; and oh!
expression of interest ever makes a ely woman look so much more lovely!—
bent her delicate form over the man
o was bribed to murder her, and after a le asked him in the gentlest tone, "Are u not better?"
"Better?" stammered the deceiver with a ble voice;—"better?—oh! yes, yes, yes—
—you are the Doge's niece, the noble sabella of Corfu?"
"The same, my good old man."
"Oh, lady! I have something to tell you—on your guard, start not, what I would
is of the utmost consequence, and deds the greatest prudence. Ah, God, that e should live men so cruel!—Lady, your is in danger."
he maiden started back; the color fled
m her cheeks.
Do you wish to behold your assassin?—
shall not die, but if you value your life, lent."
osabella knew not what to think; the nce of the old man terrified her.
ear nothing, lady, fear nothing; you
e nothing to fear while I am with you.
re you quit this arbor, you shall see the ein expire at your feet."

Rosabella made a movement as if would have fled; but suddenly the pe who sat beside her was no longer an i old man. He, who a minute before scarcely strength to mutter out a few se ces, and reclined against the arbor trem
like an aspin, sprang up with the force giant, and drew her back with one arm.

"For the love of heaven," she cried,
lease me! let me fly!"

"Lady, fear nothing; I protect you.
Thus said, Abællino placed a whistle a lips, and blew it shrilly.

Instantly sprang Matteo from his con
ment in a neighboring clump of trees, rushed into the arbor. Abællino Rosabella on the bank of turf, advan few steps to meet Matteo, and plunged dagger in his heart.

Without uttering a single cry, sank
banditti captain at the feet of Abællino;
death-rattle was heard in his throat, and a few horrid convulsions all was over.

Now did Matteo's murderer look towards the arbor, and beheld Rosabell senseless, as she lay on the bank of turf.

"Your life is safe, beautiful Rosab
said he; "there lies the villain bleeding conducted me hither to murder you.
ver yourself, return to your uncle the
and tell him that you owe your life to lino."

Rosabella could not speak. Trem tretched her arms towards him, grasped and, and pressed it to her lips in silent

tude.

ellino gazed with delight and wonder
e lovely sufferer; and in such a situawho could have beheld her without ion?—Rosabella had scarcely numbered teen summers, her light and delicate
s, enveloped in a thin, white garment
h fell around her in a thousand folds;
blue and melting eyes, whence beamed expression of purest innocence; her head, white as ivory, overshadowed by ringlets of her bright, dark hair; cheeks,
nce terror had now stolen the roses;
, which a seducer had never poisoned
a his kisses: such was Rosabella; a crea-in whose formation partial nature seem-to have omitted nothing which might titute the perfection of female loveliness.
h she was, and being such, the wretched llino may be forgiven, if for some few tes he stood like one enchanted, and ered for those few minutes the tranquil-of his heart forever.

"By him who made me," cried he at th, "oh! thou art fair, Rosabella; Vale-was not fairer!"

bowed himself down to her, and im-ed a burning kiss on the pale cheeks
he beauty.

"Leave me, thou dreadful man!" she mmered in terror; "oh! leave me!"

"Ah! Rosabella, why art thou so beauteous, and why am I—knowest thou who kissed thy cheek, Rosabella? Go! tell thy uncle, the proud Doge, 'twas the brave Abællino."

He said, and rushed out of the arbor.

CHAP. VII.—The Bravo's Bride.

IT was not without good reason, that Abællino took his departure in such haste.—He had quitted the spot but a few minutes when a large party accidentally strolled this way, and discovered with astonishment the corse of Matteo, and Rosabella pale and trembling in the arbor.

A crowd immediately collected itself around them. It increased with every moment, and Rosabella was necessitated to repeat what had happened to her for the satisfaction of every new comer.

In the mean while, some of the Doge's courtiers, who happened to be among the crowd, hastened to call her attendants together; her gondola was already waiting for her, and the terrified girl soon reached her uncle's palace in safety.

In vain was an embargo laid upon every other gondola; in vain did they examine every person, who was in the gardens of Dolabella at the time when the murderer assassin was first discovered. No trace could be found of Abællino.

The report of this strange adventure spread like wild-fire through Venice. Abællino (for Rosabella had preserved but too well in her memory that dreadful name, and by the relation of her danger had given it universal publicity) Abællino was the object of general wonder and curiosity. Every one pitied the poor Rosabella for what she had suffered, execrated the villain who had bribed Matteo to murder her, and endeavored to connect the different circumstances together by the help of one hypothesis or other, among which it would have been difficult to decide which was the most improbable.

Every one who heard the adventure told it again, and every one who told it again, added something of his own; till at length it was made into a complete romantic novel, which might have been entitled with great propriety, "The Power of Beauty;" for the Venitian gentlemen and ladies had settled the point among themselves completely to their own satisfaction, that Abællino would undoubtedly have assassinated Rosabella, had he not been prevented by her uncommon beauty. But though Abællino's interference had preserved her life, it was doubted much whether this adventure would be at all relished by her destined bridegroom, the Prince of Monaldeschi, a Neapolitan of the first rank, possessed of immense wealth and extensive influence. The Doge had for some time been secretly engaged in negociating a match between his niece and this powerful nobleman, who was soon expected to make his appearance at Venice. The motive of his journey, in spite of all the Doge's precautions, had been divulged, and it was no longer a secret to any but Rosabella, who had never seen the Prince, and could not imagine why his expected visit should excite such general curiosity.

Thus far the story had been told much to Rosabella's credit; but at length the women began to envy her for her share in the adventure. The kiss which she had received from the Bravo afforded them an excellent opportunity for throwing out a few malicious insinuations. "She received a great service," said one, "and there's no saying how far the fair Rosabella, in the warmth of gratitude, may have been carried in rewarding her preserver." "Very true," observed another, "and for my part I think it not very likely, that the fellow, being alone with a pretty girl, whose life he had just saved, should have gone away contented with a single kiss!" "Come, come," interrupted a third, "do not let us judge uncharitably; the fact may be exactly as the lady relates it; though I must say, that gentlemen of Abællino's profession are not usually so pretty behaved, and that this is the first time I ever heard of a bravo in the Platonic."

In short, Rosabella and the horrible Abællino furnished the indolent and gossiping Venitians with conversation so long, that at length the Doge's niece was universally known by the honorable appellation of the 'Bravo's Bride.'

But no one gave himself more trouble about this affair than the Doge, the good but proud Andreas. He immediately issued orders, that every person of suspicious appearance should be watched more closely than ever: the night patroles were doubled; and spies were employed daily in procuring intelligence of Abællino; and yet all was in vain—Abællino's retreat was inscrutable.

Chap. VIII.—The Conspiracy.

"Confusion!" exclaimed Parozzi, a Venitian nobleman of the first rank, as he paced his chamber with a disordered air, on the morning after Matteo's murder; "now all curses light upon the villain's awkwardness! Yet it seems inconceivable to me how all this should have fallen out so untowardly! Has any one discovered my designs?—I know well, that Verrino loves Rosabella; was it he, who opposed this confounded Abællino to Matteo, and charged him to mar my plans against her? This seems likely. And now, when the Doge inquires who it was that employed assassins to murder his neice, what other will be suspected than Parozzi, the discontented lover, to whom Rosabella refused her hand, and whom Andreas hates past hope of reconciliation?—And now, having once found the scent—Parozzi! Parozzi! should the crafty Andreas get an insight into your plans—should he learn that you have placed yourself at the head of a troop of hare-brained youths—hare-brained may I well call children, who in order to avoid the rod, set fire to their paternal mansion—Parozzi, should all this be revealed to Andreas—"

Here his reflections were interrupted. Memmo, Falieri, and Contarino entered the room, three young Venetians of the highest rank, Parozzi's inseparable companions, men depraved both in mind and body, spendthrifts, voluptuaries, well known to every usurer in Venice, and owing more than their paternal inheritance would ever admit of their paying.

"Why, how is this, Parozzi?" cried Memmo, as he entered, (a wretch whose very features exhibited marks of that libertinism to which his life had been dedicated) "I can scarce recover myself from my astonishment! For Heaven's sake, is this report true? Did you really hire Matteo to murder the Doge's neice?"

"I?" exclaimed Parozzi, and hastily turned away to hide the deadly paleness which verspread his countenance; "why should you suppose that any such design—surely, Memmo, you are distracted."

Memmo.—By my soul, I speak but the plain matter of fact. Nay, only ask Falieri—he can tell you more.

Falieri.—Faith, 'tis certain, Parozzi, that Lomellino has declared to the Doge, as a truth beyond doubting, that you, and none but you, were the person, who instigated Matteo to attempt Rosabella's life.

Parozzi.—And I tell you again, that Lomellino knows not what he says.

Contarino.—Well, well! be on your guard. Andreas is a terrible fellow to deal with.

Falieri.—He terrible? I tell you, he is the most contemptible blockhead that the universe can furnish. Courage, perhaps, he possesses, but of brains not an atom.

Contarino.—And I tell you that Andreas is as brave as a lion, and as crafty as a fox.

Falieri.—Psha! psha! every thing would go to wreck and ruin, were it not for the wiser heads of the triumvirate of counsellors, whom Heaven confound! Deprive him of Paolo Manfrone, Conari, and Lomellino, and the Doge would stand there looking as foolish as a school boy, who was going to be examined, and had forgotten his lesson.

Parozzi.—Falieri is in the right.

Memmo.—Quite! quite!

Falieri.—And then Andreas is as proud as a beggar grown rich and dressed in his first suit of embroidery. By St. Anthony! he is become quite insupportable. Do you not observe how he increases the number of his attendants daily?

Memmo.—Nay, that is an undoubted fact.

Contarino.—And then to what an unbounded extent has he carried his influence! The Signioria, the Quaranti, the Procurators of St. Mark, the Avocatori, all think and act exactly as suits the Doge's pleasure and convenience. Every soul of them depends as much on that one man's humor and caprices, as puppets do, who nod or shake their wooden heads, just as the fellow behind the curtain thinks proper to move the wires.

Parozzi.—And yet the populace idolize this Andreas!

Memmo.—Aye, that is the worst part of the story.

Falieri.—But never credit me again, if he does not experience a reverse of fortune speedily.

Contarino.—That might happen, would we but set our shoulders to the wheel stoutly. But what do we do? We pass our time in taverns and brothels, drink and game, and throw ourselves headlong into such an ocean of debts, that the best swimmer must sink at last. Let us resolve to make the attempt; let us seek recruits on all sides; let us labor with all our might and main: things must change; or if they do not, take my word for it, my friends, this world no longer a world for us.

Memmo.—Nay, it is a melancholy truth that during the last half year, my creditors have been ready to beat my door down with knocking; I am awakened out of my sleep in the morning, and lulled to rest again at night, with no other music than their eternal clamors.

Parozzi.—Ha! ha! ha! As for me, I need not tell you how I am situated.

Falieri.—Had we been less extravagant we might at this moment have been sitting quietly in our palaces, and—but as things stand now—

Parozzi.—Well—'as things stand now'—I verily believe that Falieri is going to moralize!

Contarino.—That is ever the way with old sinners, when they have lost the power to sin any longer:—then they are ready to weep over their past life, and talk loudly about repentance and reformation. Now for my own part, I am perfectly well satisfied with my wanderings from the common beaten paths of morality and prudence. They serve to convince me, that I am not one of your every-day men, who sit cramped up in the chimney-corner, lifeless and phlegmatic, and shudder when they hear of any extraordinary occurrence. Nature evidently intended me to be a libertine, and I am determined to fulfil my destination

Why, if spirits like ours were not produced every now and then, the world would absolutely go fast asleep; but we rouse it by deranging the old order of things, force mankind to quicken their snail's pace, furnish a million of idlers with riddles which they puzzle their brains about, without being able to comprehend, infuse some few hundreds of new ideas into the heads of the great multitude, and in short, are as useful to the world as tempests are, which dissipate those exhalations, with which nature otherwise would poison herself.

Falieri.—Excellent sophistry, by my honour! Why, Contarino, ancient Rome has had an irreparable loss in not having numbered you among her orators: it is a pity though, that there should be so little that is solid wrapt up in so many fine sounding words. Now learn, that while you, with this rare talent of elcquence, have been most unmercifully wearing out the patience of your good natured hearers, Falieri has been in action! The Cardinal Gonzaga is discontented with the government; heaven knows what Andreas has done to make him so vehemently his enemy; but, in short, Gonzaga now belongs to our party.

Parozzi, (with astonishment and delight.)—Falieri, are you in your senses? The Cardinal Gonzaga—

Falieri.—Is ours, and ours both body and I confess, I was obliged to rhodomon-ade a good deal to him about our patriotism, our glorious designs, our love for freedom, and so forth; in short, Gonzaga is a hypocrite, and therefore is Gonzaga the fitter for us.

Contarino, (clasping Falieri's hand.)—Bravo, my friend! Venice shall see a second edition of Catiline's conspiracy. Now, then, it is my turn to speak, for I have not been idle since we parted. In truth, I have as yet caught nothing, but I have made myself master of an all-powerful net, with which I doubt not to capture the best half of Venice. You all know the Marchioness Olympia?

Parozzi.—Does not each of us keep a list of the handsomest women in the republic, and can we have forgotten number one?

Falieri.—Olympia and Rosabella are the goddesses of Venice: our youths burn incense on no other altar.

Contarino.—Olympia is my own.

Falieri.—How?

Parozzi.—Olympia?

Contarino.—Why, how now? Why stare ye, as if I had prophesied to you that the skies were going to fall? I tell you, Olympia's heart is mine, and that I possess her entire and most intimate confidence. Our connection must remain a profound secret; but depend upon it, whatever I wish, she wishes also; and you know she can make half the nobility in Venice dance to the sound of her pipe, let her play what t

she pleases.

Parozzi.—Contarino, you are our ma

Contarino.—And you had not the l suspicion how powerful an ally I w boring to procure for you?

Parozzi.—I must blush for myself wh listen to you, since as yet I have don thing. Yet this I must say in my ex had Matteo, bribed by my gold, ac plished Rosabella's murder, the Doge w
have been robbed of that chain, with w
he holds the chief men of Venice att to his government. Andreas would no merit, were Rosabella once remo
The most illustrious families would ca longer for his friendship, were their
of a connection with him by means o neice buried in her grave. Rosabella one day be the Doge's heiress.

Memmo.—All that I can do for you in business is to provide you with pecu
sup[illegible]ies. My old miserable uncle, w whole property becomes mine at his d has brim-full coffers, and the old miser whenever I say the word.

Falieri.—You have suffered him to liv long already.

Memmo.—Why, I never have been to make up my mind entirely to—would scarcely believe it, friends—bu times I am so hypochondriac, I could al
fancy I feel twinges of conscience.

Contarino.—Indeed! Then take my advice, and go into a monastery.

Memmo.—Yes, truly, that would suit me to a hair.

Falieri.—Our first care must be to find out our old acquaintances, Matteo's companions: yet having hitherto always transacted business with them through their captain, I know not where they are to be met with.

Parozzi.—As soon as they are found, their first employment must be the removal of the Doge's trio of advisers.

Contarino.—That were an excellent idea, if it were but as easily done as said. Well then, my friends, this principal point at last is decided. Either we will bury our debts under the ruins of the existing constitution of the republic, or make Andreas a gift of our heads towards strengthening the walls of the building. In either case, we shall at least obtain quiet. Necessity, with her whip of serpents, has driven us to the very point of her rock, whence we must save ourselves by some act of extraordinary daring, or be precipitated on the opposite side into the abyss of shame and eternal oblivion. The next point to be considered, is how we may best obtain supplies for our necessary expenses, and induce others to join with us in our plans. For this purpose we must use every artifice to secure in our interests the courtezans of the greatest celebrity in Venice. What we should be unable to effect by every power of persuasion, banditti by their daggers, and princes by their treasuries, can one of these Phrynes accomplish with a single look. Where the terrors of the scaffold are without effect, and the priest's exhortations are heard with coldness, a wanton kiss and a tender promise often perform wonders. The most vigilant fidelity drops to sleep on the voluptuous bosoms of these witches; the warmth of their kisses can thaw the lips of secrecy itself; and the bell which sounded the hour of assignation, has often rang the knell of the most sacred principles and most steadfast resolutions. But should you either fail to gain the mastery over the minds of these women, or fear to be yourselves entangled in the nets you wish to spread for others—in these cases you must have recourse to the holy father confessors. Flatter the pride of these insolent friars; paint for them upon the blank leaf of futurity, bishops' mitres, patriarchal missions, the hats of cardinals, and the keys of St. Peter; my life upon it, they will spring at the bait, and you will have them completely at your disposal. These hypocrites, who govern the consciences of the bigoted Venetians, hold man and woman, the noble and the mendicant, the Doge and the gondolier, bound fast in the chains of superstition, by which they can lead them wheresoever it best suits their pleasure. It will save us tons of gold in gaining over proselytes, and keeping their consciences quiet when gained, if we can but obtain the assistance of the confessors, whose blessings and curses pass with the multitude for current coin. Now then to work, comrades, and so farewell.

CHAP. IX.—Cynthia's Dwelling.

Scarcely had Abællino achieved the bloody deed which employed every tongue in Venice, than he changed his dress and whole appearance with so much expedition and success as to prevent the slightest suspicion of his being Matteo's murderer. He quitted the gardens unquestioned, nor left the least trace which could lead to a discovery.

He arrived at Cynthia's dwelling. It was evening. Cynthia opened the door, and Abællino entered the common apartment.

"Where are the rest?" said he in a savage tone of voice, whose sound made Cynthia tremble.

"They have been asleep," she answered, "since mid-day. Probably they mean to go out on some pursuit to-night."

Abællino threw himself into a chair, and seemed to be lost in thought.

"But why are you always so gloomy, Abællino," said Cynthia, drawing near him; "it is that which makes you so ugly. Pray thee, away with those frowns; they make your countenance look worse than nature made it."

Abællino made no answer.

"Really, you are enough to frighten a body! Come now, let us be friends, Abællino; I begin not to dislike you, and to endure your appearance; and I don't know but—"

"Go! wake the sleepers!" roared the Bravo.

"The sleepers? Psha! let them sleep on, the stupid rogues! Sure you are not afraid to be alone with me? Mercy on me, one would think I looked as terrible as yourself! Do I? Nay, look on me, Abællino!"

Cynthia, to say the truth, was by no means an ill-looking girl; her eyes were bright and expressive; her hair fell in shining ringlets over her bosom; her lips were red and full, and she bowed them towards Abællino's—but Abællino's were still sacred by the touch of Rosabella's cheek. He started from his seat, and removed (yet gently) Cynthia's hand, which rested on his shoulder.

"Wake the sleepers, my good girl," said he, "I must speak with them this moment."

Cynthia hesitated.

"Nay go!" said he in a fierce voice.

Cynthia retired in silence; yet, as she crossed the threshold, she stopped for an instant, and menaced him with her finger.

Abællino strode through the chamber with hasty steps, his head reclining on his shoulders arms folded over his breast.

"The first step is taken," said he to himself; "there is one moral monster the less on earth. I have committed no sin by this murder; I have but performed a sacred duty. Aid me, thou Great and Good, for arduous is the task before me. Ah! should that task be gone through with success, and Rosabella be the reward of my labors—Rosabella?—What, shall the Doge's neice bestow her hand on the outcast Abællino?—Oh! madman that I am to hope it! No! never was there frenzy equal to mine! To attach myself at first sight to——Yet Rosabella is capable of thus enchanting at first sight! Rosabella and Valeria! To be beloved by two such women! Yet though 'tis impossible to attain, the striving to attain such an end is glorious. Illusions so delightful will at least make me happy for a moment, and alas! the wretched Abællino needs illusions, that for a moment will make him happy. Oh! surely knew the world what I gladly would accomplish, the world would both pity and love me."

Cynthia returned, the four Bravos followed her, yawning, grumbling, and still half asleep. "Come, come," said Abællino; "rouse yourselves, lads. Before I say any thing, be convinced that you are wide awake, for what I am going to tell you is so strange, that you will needs believe it to be a dream."

They listened to him with an air of indifference and impatience. "Why, what's the matter now?" said Tomaso, while he stretched himself.

"Neither more nor less, than that our honest, hearty, brave Matteo is—murdered!"

"What? Murdered!" every one exclaimed, and gazed with looks of terror on the bearer of this unwelcome news; while Cynthia gave a loud scream, and clasping her hands together, sunk almost breathless into a chair.

A general silence prevailed for some time.

"Murdered?" at length repeated Tomaso, and by whom?

Baluzzo.—Where?

Petrino.—What! this forenoon?

Abœllino.—In the gardens of Dolabella, where he was found bleeding at the feet of the Doge's neice. Whether he fell by her hand, or by that of one of her admirers, I cannot say.

Cynthia, (weeping.)—Poor dear Matteo!

Abœllino.—About this time to-morrow you will see his corse exhibited on the gibbet.

Petrino.—What! did any one recognize him?

Abœllino.—Yes, yes! there's no doubt about his trade, you may depend on't.

Cynthia.—The gibbet!—Poor, dear Matteo!

Tomaso.—This is a fine piece of work!

Baluzzo.—Confound the fellow! who would have thought of any thing happening so unlucky?

Abællino.—Why, how now? You seem be overcome.

Struzzo.—I cannot recover myself: surrise and terror have almost stupified me.

Abællino.—Indeed! by my life, when I ard the news, I burst into laughter: 'Sigr Matteo,' said I, 'I wish your worship y of your safe arrival.'

Tomaso.—What?

Struzzo.—You laughed? Hang me if I an see what there is to laugh at.

Abællino.—Why, surely you are not afraid f receiving what you are so ready to bestow n others? What is your object? What can re expect as our reward at the end of our abors, except the gibbet or the rack? What memorials of our actions shall we leave beind us, except our skeletons dancing in ie air, and the chains which rattle around iem? He who chooses to play the Bravo's irt on the great theatre of the world, must ot be afraid of death, whether it comes at ie hand of the physician, or of the executioner. Come, come! pluck up your spirits, mrades.

Tomaso.—That's easy to say, but quite it of my power.

Petrino.—Mercy on me—how my teeth hatter!

Baluzzo.—Pr'ythee, Abællino, be composed for a moment or two—your gaiety at time like this, is quite horrible.

Cynthia.—Oh me! Oh me!—Poor dered Matteo!

Abællino.—Hey day! Why, what this? Cynthia, my life, are you not as of being such a child? Come, let you renew that conversation which my s you to wake these gentlemen interru sit down by me, sweet heart, and giv kiss.

Cynthia.—Out upon you, monster!

Abællino.—What, have you altered mind, my pretty dear? Well, well— all my heart. When you are in the hu I may not have the inclination.

Baluzzo.—Death and the devil, Abæ is this a time for talking nonsense? Pr keep such trash for a fitter occasion let us consider what we are to do jus

Petrino.—Nay, this is no season for tri

Struzzo.—Tell us, Abællino, you clever fellow; what course it it best to take?

Abællino, (after a pause.)—Nothing be done, or a great deal. One of two th must we choose—either we must re where we are, and what we are, m honest men to please any rascal who give us gold and fair words, and mak our minds to be hung, broken on the wh condemned to the galleys, burnt alive, cified or beheaded at the long run, just may seem best to the supreme authority; else—

Tomaso.—Or else? Well?

Abællino.—Or else we must divide the ils which are already in our possession, t the republic, begin a new and better , and endeavour to make our peace with ven. We have already wealth enough make it unnecessary for us to ask, 'How ll we get our bread?' You may either y an estate in some foreign country, or ep an Osteria, or engage in commerce, , in short, do whatever you like best, so t you do but abandon the profession of assassin. Then we may look out a wife ong the pretty girls of our own rank in e, become the happy fathers of sons and ughters, may eat and drink in peace and urity, and make amends, by the honesty of r future lives, for the offences of our past.

Tomaso.—Ha! ha! ha!

Abællino.—What you do, that will I do ; I will either hang, or be broken on wheel with you, or become an honest n, just as you please. Now then, what is ir decision?

Tomaso.—Was there ever such a stupid nsellor?

Petrino.—Our decision? Nay, the point ot very difficult to decide.

Abællino.—I should have thought it had n.

Tomaso.—Without more words then, I te for our remaining as we are, and car- ng on our old trade; that will bring u-

in plenty of gold, and enable us to lead jolly life.

Petrino.—Right, lad! You speak m thoughts exactly.

Tomaso.—We are Bravos, it is true; b
what then? We are honest fellows; and t devil take him who dares say we are n
However, at any rate, we must keep withi doors for a few days, lest we should be di covered; for I warrant you the Doge's spi
are abroad in search of us. But as soon
the pursuit is over, be it our first busin
to find out Matteo's murderer, and throt
him out of hand, as a warning to all othe

All.—Bravo! bravissimo!

Petrino.—And from this day forth, I vo
that Tomaso should be our Captain.

Struzzo.—Aye, in Matteo's stead.

All.—Right! right!

Abœllino.—To which I say amen with my heart. Now then, all is decided.

BOOK II.

CHAP. I.—The Birth Day.

IN solitude and anxiety, with barred windows and bolted doors, did the banditti pass the day immediately succeeding Matteo's murder; every murmur in the street appeared to them a cause of apprehension; every footstep which approached their doors made them tremble till it had passed them.

In the mean while the ducal palace blazed with splendor, and resounded with mirth. The Doge celebrated the birth-day of his fair neice, Rosabella, and the feast was honored by the presence of the chief persons of the city, of the foreign ambassadors, and of many illustrious strangers who were at that time residents in Venice.

On this occasion no expense had been spared, no source of pleasure had been neglected. The arts contended with each other for superiority; the best poets in Venice celebrated this day with powers excelling any thing which they had before exhibited, for the subject of their verses was Rosabella; the musicians and virtuosi surpassed all their former triumphs, for their object was to obtain the suffrage of Ro-

bella.—The singular union of all kind pleasure intoxicated the imagination of e guest; and the Genius of delight exte his influence over the whole assembly, the old man and the youth, over the ma and the virgin.

The venerable Andreas had seldom b seen in such high spirits as on this occas He was all life; smiles of satisfaction pla round his lips; gracious and condescend to every one, he made it his chief care to vent his rank from being felt. Sometim he trifled with the ladies, whose bea formed the greatest ornament of this ent tainment; sometimes he mingled among masks whose fantastic appearance and gai of conversation enlivened the ball-room their variety; at other times he pla chess with the generals and admirals of republic; and frequently he forsook ev thing to gaze with delight on Rosabell dancing, or listen in silent rapture to Ro bella's music.

Lomellino, Conari, and Paolo Manfro the Doge's three confidential friends counsellors, in defiance of their gray ha mingled in the throng of youthful beauti flirted first with one, and then with anoth and the arrows of raillery were darted a received on both sides with spirit and go humor.

"Now, Lomellino," said Andreas to h friend, who entered the saloon, in which t

was at that time accidentally alone
his neice; "you seem in gayer spirits ening than when you were lying becardonia, and had so hard a game to gainst the Turks."
nellino.—I shall not take upon me to that, Signor. I still think with a mix-of terror and satisfaction, on the night
we took Scardonia, and carried the moon before the city walls. By my soul Venetians fought like lions.
ndreas.—Fill this goblet to their memo-y old soldier; you have earned your ravely.
nellino.—Aye, Signor, and oh! it is so to rest on laurels! But in truth, 'tis that I am indebted for mine; it is you have immortalized me. No soul on would have known that Lomellino
, had he not fought in Dalmatia and under the banners of the great Anand assisted him in raising eternal es in honor of the republic.
reas.—My good Lomellino, the Cyprus
as heated your imagination.
llino.—Nay, I know well I ought call you great, and praise you thus to your face; but faith, Signor, I am too old for it to be worth my while
er. That is a business which I leave r young courtiers, who have never me within the smell of powder, and never fought for Venice and Andreas.

Andreas.—You are an old enthusia
Think you the emperor is of the same ion?

Lomellino.—Unless Charles the Fift deceived by those about him, or is too p to allow the greatness of an enemy, he say perforce, 'There is but one man on whom I fear, and who is worthy to co
with me; and that man is Andreas.'

Andreas.—I suspect he will be sorely pleased when he receives my answer t message by which he notified to me the prisonment of the French king.

Lomellino.—Displeased he will be, Sig
no doubt of it: but what then? Venice not fear his displeasure while Andreas lives. But when you and your heroes once gone to your eternal rest, then al thee, poor Venice! I fear your golden will soon come to their conclusion.

Andreas.—What? have we not young officers of great promise?

Lomellino.—Alas! what are most of th Heroes in the fields of Venus! Heroes drinking bout! Effeminate striplings, laxed both in mind and body! But ho
I running on, forgetful! Ah! when grown so old, and conversing with an dreas, it is easy to forget every thing
My lord, I sought you with a request—quest too of consequence.

Andreas.—You excite my curiosity.

Lomellino.—About a week ago, there

ived here a young Florentine nobleman, alled Flodoardo, a youth of noble appearnce and great promise.

Andreas.—Well?

Lomellino.—His father was one of my earest friends; he is dead now, the good ld generous nobleman! In our youth we erved together on board the same vessel, nd many a turbaned head has fell beneath his sword. Ah! he was a brave soldier.

Andreas.—While celebrating the father's bravery, you seem to have quite forgotten the son.

Lomellino.—His son is arrived in Venice, nd wishes to enter into the service of the republic. I entreat you to give the young man some respectable situation; he will prove the boast of Venice, when we shall be n our graves; on that would I hazard my xistence.

Andreas.—Has he sense and talent?

Lomellino.—That he has; and an heart ke his father's. Will it please you to see d converse with him?, He is yonder a- ong the masks in the saloon. One thing must tell you, as a specimen of his deigns: He has heard of the banditti who est Venice; and he engages, that the first ce of work which he renders the repubshall be the delivering into the hands of stice these concealed assassins, who hitherto have eluded the vigilance of our police.

Andreas:—Indeed? I doubt that promiwill be too much for his power to perform. Flodoardo, I think you call him? Tell him I would speak with him.

Lomellino.—Oh! then I have gained at least half of my cause, and I believe the whole of it; for to see Flodoardo, and not to like him, is as difficult as to look at paradise and not wish to enter. To see Flodoardo, and to hate him, is as unlikely, as that a blind man should hate the kind hand which removes the cataract from his eyes, and pours upon them the blessings of light and the beauties of nature.

Andreas, (smiling.)—In the whole course of our acquaintance, Lomellino, never did I hear you so enthusiastic!—Go then; conduct this prodigy hither.

Lomellino.—I hasten to find him. And as for you, Signora, look to yourself! Look to yourself, I say!

Rosabella.—Nay, pry'thee, Lomellino, bring your hero hither without delay; you have raised my curiosity to the height.

Lomellino quitted the saloon.

Andreas.—How comes it that you rejoin not the dancers, my child?

Rosabella.—I am weary, and besides curiosity now detains me here, for I would fain see this Flodoardo, whom Lomellino thinks deserving of such extraordinary praise.—Shall I tell you the truth, my dear uncle? I verily believe that I am already acquainted with him. There was a mask in a Grecian bit, whose appearance was so striking, at it was impossible for him to remain nfounded with the crowd: the least atten- e eye must have singled him out from ong a thousand. It was a tall, light fig- e, so graceful in every movement——then s dancing was quite perfection!

Andreas, (smiling, and threatening with his ger.)—Child! child!

Rosabella.—Nay, my dear uncle, what I y is mere justice: it is possible indeed, that e Greek and Florentine may be two diffe- nt persons; but still, according to Lomel- no's description——Oh! look, dear uncle, ly look yonder! there stands the Greek as live.

Andreas.—And Lomellino is with him— ey approach—Rosabella, you have made good guess.

The Doge had scarcely ceased to speak, hen Lomellino entered the room, conduct- g a tall young man, richly habited in the recian fashion.

"My gracious Lord," said Lomellino, present to you the count Flodoardo, who mbly sues for your protection."

Flodoardo uncovered his head in token of pect, took off his mask, and bowed low ore the illustrious ruler of Venice.

ndreas.—I understand you are desirous rving the republic?

Flodoardo.—That is my ambition, should r highness think me deserving of such honor.

Andreas.—Lomellino speaks highly
you; if all that he says be true, how ca
you to deprive your own country of yo services?

Flodoardo.—Because my own country not governed by an Andreas.

Andreas.—You have intentions, it seems discovering the haunts of the banditti, w
for some time past have caused so ma
tears to flow in Venice?

Flodoardo.—If your highness would de to confide in me, I would answer with head for their delivery into the hands your officers, and that speedily.

Andreas.—That were much for a stran
to perform. I would fain make the tr
whether you can keep your word.

Flodoardo.—That is sufficient. To-m row, or the day after, at latest, will I p form my promise.

Andreas.—And you make that promise resolutely? Are you aware, young man, h dangerous a task it is to surprise these m creants? They are never to be found wh sought for, and always present when le expected; they are at once every whe
and no where; there exists not a nook
all Venice which our spies are not acqua ed with, or have left unexamined, and has our police endeavoured in vain to cover the place of their concealment.

Flodoardo.—I know all this, and to kn rejoices me, since it affords me an opp

nity of convincing the Doge of Venice, at my actions are not those of a common venturer.

Andreas.—Perform your promise, and n let me hear of you. For the present, r discourse shall end here, for no unplea- t thoughts must disturb the joy to which s day is dedicated.—Rosabella, would u not like to join the dancers?—Count, I nfide her to your care.

Flodoardo.—I could not be entrusted with more precious charge.

Rosabella, during this conversation, had en leaning against the back of her uncle's air: she repeated to herself Lomellino's sertion, 'That to see Flodoardo, and not like him, was as difficult as to look at radise, and not wish to enter;' and while e gazed on the youth, she allowed that mellino had not exaggerated. When her cle desired Flodoardo to conduct her to dancers, a soft blush overspread her eks, and she doubted whether she should ept or decline the hand which was imme- tely offered.

And to tell you my real opinion, my fair es, I suspect that very few of you would e been more collected than Rosabella, you found yourselves similarly situated. ruth, such a form as Flodoardo's! a ntenance whose physiognomy seemed a sport at once to the heart of all who ex- ined it; features so enquisitely fashioned,

that the artist who wished to execute a model of manly beauty, had he imitated them, would have had nothing to supply or improve; features, every one of which spoke so clearly,—"The bosom of this youth contains the heart of an hero:"—ah! ladies, my dear ladies, a man like this might well make some mittle confusion in the head and heart of a poor young girl, tender and unsuspicious!

Flodoardo took Rosabella's hand, and led her into the ball-room. Here all was mirth and splendor; the roofs re-echoed with the full swell of harmony, and the floor trembled beneath the multitude of dancers, who formed a thousand beautiful groups by the blaze of innumerable lustres. Yet Flodoardo and Rosabella passed on in silence, till they reached the extreme end of the great saloon. Here they stopped, and remained before an open window. Some minutes passed, and still they spoke not. Sometimes they gazed on each other, sometimes on the dancers, sometimes on the moon; and then again they forgot each other, the dancers and the moon, and were totally absorbed in themselves.

"Lady," said Flodoardo at length, "can there be a greater misfortune?"

"A misfortune!" said Rosabella, starting as if suddenly awaking from a dream; "what misfortune, Signor? who is unfortunate?"

"He who is doomed to behold the joy of elysium, and never to possess them: he who dies of thirst, and sees a cup stand full before him, but which he knows is destined for the lips of another!"

"And are you, my lord, this out-cast from elysium? are you the thirsty one who stands near the cup which is filled for another? is it thus that you wish me to understand your speech?"

"You understand it as I meant: and now tell me, lovely Rosabella, am I not indeed unfortunate?"

"And where then is the elysium which you must never possess?"

"Where Rosabella is, there is elysium."

Rosabella blushed, and cast her eyes on the ground.

"You are not offended, Signora?" said Flodoardo, and took her hand with an air of respectful tenderness; "has this openness displeased you?"

"You are a native of Florence, Count Flodoardo; in Venice we dislike these kind of compliments; at least I dislike them, and wish to hear them from no person less than from you."

"By my life, Signora, I spoke but as I thought; my words concealed no flattery."

"See! the Doge enters the saloon with Manfrone and Lomellino; he will seek us among the dancers. Come, let us join them."

Flodoardo followed her in silence. The dance began. Heavens! how lovely!

Rosabella, as she glided along to the sweet sounds of music, conducted by Flodoardo! How handsome looked Flodoardo, as, lighter than air, he flew down the dance, while his brilliant eyes saw no object but Rosabella! He was still without his mask, and bare headed; but every eye glanced away from the helmets and barettes, waving with plumes and sparkling with jewels, to gaze on Flodoardo's raven locks, as they floated on the air in wild luxuriance. A murmur of admiration rose from every corner of the saloon, but it rose unmarked by those who were the objects of it; neither Rosabella no Flodoardo at that moment formed a wish to be applauded, except by each other.

CHAP. II.—The Florentine Stranger.

Two evenings had elapsed since the Doge's entertainment; on the second, Parozzi sat in his own apartment with Memmo and Falieri. Dimly burnt the lights: lowering and tempestuous were the skies without; gloomy and fearful were the souls of the libertines within.

Parozzi, (after a long silence.)—What, are you both dreaming? Ho, there! Memmo, Falieri, fill your goblets.

Memmo, (with indifference.)—Well—to please you—but I care not for wine to-night.

Falieri.—Nor I. Methinks it tastes like negar.—Yet the wine itself is good; 'tis
r ill temper spoils it.
Parozzi.—Confound the rascals!
Memmo.—What? the banditti?
Parozzi.—Not a trace of them can be
nd. It is enough to kill one with vexation.
Falieri.—And in the mean while, the time
ns out, our projects will get wind, and en we sit quietly in the state prisons of enice, objects of derision to the populace id ourselves! I could tear my flesh for ger!—(A universal silence.) Parozzi., (striking his hand against the table ssionately,)—Flodoardo! Flodoardo!
Falieri.—In a couple of hours I must tend the Cardinal Gonzaga; and what telligence shall I have to give him?
Memmo.—Come, come—Contarino cant have been absent so long without cause.
warrant you he will bring some news with
m when he arrives.
Falieri.—Psha! psha! my life on't, he s at this moment at Olympia's feet, and rgets us, the republic, the banditti, and mself.
Parozzi.—And so neither of you know
y thing of this Flodoardo?
Memmo.—No more than of what happen-
d on Rosabella's birth-day.
Falieri.—Well then, I know one thing
ore about him—Parozzi is jealous of h Parozzi.—I? Ridiculous! Rosabella

bestow her hand on the German emperor or a Venetian gondolier, without its giving me the least anxiety.

Falieri.—Ha! ha! ha!

Memmo.—Well, one thing at least even envy must confess—Flodoardo is the handsomest man in Venice. I doubt whether there's a woman in the city who has virtue enough to resist him.

Parozzi.—And I should doubt it too, if women had as little sense as you have, and looked only at the shell, without minding the kernel——

Memmo.—Which unluckily is exactly the thing which women always do.

Falieri.—The old Lomellino seems to be extremely intimate with this Flodoardo; they say he was acquainted with his father.

Memmo.—It was he who presented him to the Doge.

Parozzi.—Hark!—Surely some one knocked at the palace door.

Memmo.—It can be none but Contarino. Now, then, we shall hear whether he has discovered the banditti.

Falieri, (starting from his chair.)—I'll swear to that footstep—it's Contarino.

The doors were thrown open, and Contarino entered hastily, enveloped in his cloak. "Good evening, sweet gentlemen," said he, and threw his mantle aside. Memmo, Parozzi, and Falieri started back in amazement. "Good God!" they exclaimed,

BRAVO OF VENICE

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN,

BY M. G. LEWIS.

What black magician conjured this fiend—
What! do ye tremble? are ye all afraid?
Now, by the gods, he lives to curse the day
That stirred up valour in this desperate man,
And put a sword into his hand against Whom these thrice-fearful summons of his look Shakespeare.

Stereotyped by D. Watson, Woodstock.

WOODSTOCK, VT.
PRINTED BY DAVID WATSON.
1826.

losopher Parozzi spreads that plaister for me! I thank you, friend; that's enough.—And now, comrades, place yourselves in a circle round me, and listen to the wonders which I am going to relate.

Falieri.—Proceed.

Contarino.—As soon as it was twilight, I stole out, wrapped in my cloak, determined if possible, to discover some of the banditti; I knew not their persons, neither were they acquainted with mine;—an extravagant undertaking, perhaps you will tell me; but I was resolved to convince you that every thing which a man determines to do, may be done. I had some information respecting the rascals, though it was but slight, and on these grounds I proceeded. I happened by mere accident to stumble upon a gondolier, whose appearance excited my curiosity. I fell into discourse with him; I was soon convinced that he was not ignorant of the lurking-place of the Bravos, and by means of some gold and many fair speeches, I at length brought him to confess, that though not regularly belonging to the band, he had occasionally been employed by them. I immediately made a bargain with him;—he conducted me in his gondola through the greatest part of Venice, sometimes right and sometimes left, till I lost every idea as to the quarter of the town in which I found myself. At length he insisted on binding eyes with his handkerchief, and I was compelled to submit to this condition. Half an hour elapsed before the gondola stopped; he told me to descend, conducted me through a couple of streets, and at length knocked at a door, where he left me still blindfolded—the door was opened; my business was inquired with great caution, and after some demur I was at length admitted. The handkerchief was now withdrawn from my eyes, and I found myself in a small chamber, surrounded by four men of not the most creditable appearance, and a young woman, who, it seems, had opened the door for me.

Falieri.—You are a daring fellow, Contarino.

Contarino.—Here was no time to be lost. I instantly threw my purse on the table, promised them mountains of gold, and fixed on particular days, hours and signals, which were necessary to facilitate our future intercourse. For the present I only required that Manfrone, Conari, and Lomellino should be removed with all possible expedition.

All.—Bravo!

Contarino.—So far every thing went exactly as we could have wished; and one of my new associates was just setting out to guide me home, when we were surprised by an unexpected visit.

Parozzi.—Well?

Memmo, (anxiously.)—Go on, for God's sake!

Contarino.—A knocking was heard at the door; the girl went to inquire the cause; in an instant she returned pale as a corse, and—'Fly! fly!' cried she.

Falieri.—What followed?

Contarino.—Why then followed a whole legion of sbirri and police-officers; and who should be at their head but——the Florentine stranger!

All.—Flodoardo! what, Flodoardo?

Contarino.—Flodoardo.

Falieri.—What demon could have guided him thither?

Parozzi.—Hell and furies! O! that I had been there!

Memmo.—There now, Parozzi! you see at least that Flodoardo is no coward.

Falieri.—Hush, let us hear the rest.

Contarino.—We stood, as if we had been petrified; not a soul could move a finger. 'In the name of the Doge and the republic,' cried Flodoardo, 'yield yourselves, and deliver your arms.'—'The devil shall yield himself sooner than we,' exclaimed one of the banditti, and forced a sword from one of the officers; the others snatched muskets from the walls; and as for me, my first care was to extinguish the lamp, so that we could not tell friends from foes. But still the confounded moonshine gleamed through the window-shutters, and shed a partial light through the room. 'Look to yourself, Contarino!' thought I; 'if you are found here, you will be hanged for company!' and I drew my sword, and made a lounge at Flodoardo. But, however well intended, my thrust was foiled by his sabre, which he whirled around with the rapidity of lightning. I fought like a madman, but all my skill was without effect on this occasion, and before I was aware of it, Flodoardo ripped open my bosom. I found myself wounded, and sprang back; at that moment two pistols were fired, and the flash discovered to me a small side door which they had neglected to beset; through this I stole unperceived into the adjoining chamber, burst open the grated window, sprang below unhurt, crossed a court yard, climbed two or three garden walls, gained the canal, where a gondola fortunately was waiting, persuaded the boatman to convey me with all speed to the palace of St. Mark, and thence hastened hither, astonished to find myself alive. There is an infernal adventure for you!

Parozzi.—I shall go mad!

Falieri.—Every thing we design is counteracted! The more trouble we give ourselves, the further we are from the goal.

Memmo.—I confess, it seems to me as if Heaven gave us warning to desist. How say you?

Contarino.—Psha! these are trifles. Such accidents should only serve to sharpen our wits. The more obstacles I encounter, the firmer is my resolution to surmount them.

Falieri.—Do the banditti know who you are?

Contarino.—No; they are not only ignorant of my name, but suppose me to be a mere instrument of some powerful man, who has been injured by the ducal confederates.

Memmo.—Well, Contarino, in my mind, you should thank heaven that you have escaped so well.

Falieri.—But since he is an absolute stranger in Venice, how could Flodoardo discover the lurking-place of the banditti?

Contarino.—I know not—probably by mere accident, like myself. But by the power that made me, he shall pay dearly for this wound!

Falieri.—Flodoardo is rather too hasty in making himself remarked.

Parozzi.—Flodoardo must die!

Contarino, (filling a goblet.)—May his next cup contain poison!

Falieri.—I shall do myself the honor of becoming better acquainted with the gentleman.

Contarino.—Memmo, we must needs have full purses, or our business will hang on hand woefully. When does your uncle take his departure for a better world?

Memmo.—To-morrow evening!—and yet —Ugh! I tremble!

CHAP. III.—More Confusion.

Since Rosabella's birth-day, no woman in Venice who had the slightest pretensions to beauty, or the most remote expectations in making conquests, had any subject of conversation except the handsome Florentine: he found employment for every female tongue, and she who dared not employ her tongue, made amends for the privation with her thoughts. Many a maiden now enjoyed less tranquil slumbers; many an experienced coquette sighed, as she laid on color at the looking-glass; many a prude forgot the rules which she had imposed upon herself, and daily frequented the gardens and public walks, in which report gave her the hope of meeting Flodoardo.

But from the time that, placing himself at the head of the sbirri, he had dared to enter boldly the den of the banditti, and seize them at the hazard of his life, he was scarcely more an object of attention among the women than the men. Greatly did they admire his courage and unshaken presence of mind, while engaged in so perilous an adventure; but still more were they astonished at his penetration in discovering where the Bravos concealed themselves, an attempt which had foiled even the keen wits of the so much celebrated police of Venice.

The Doge Andreas cultivated the acquaintance of this singular young man with increasing assiduity; and the more he conversed with him, the more deserving of consideration did Flodoardo appear. The action by which he had rendered the republic a service so essential, was rewarded by a present that would not have disgraced imperial gratitude; and one of the most important offices in the state was confided to his superintendence.

Both favors were conferred unsolicited; but no sooner was the Florentine apprised of the Doge's benevolent care of him, than with modesty and respect he requested to decline the proposed advantages. The only favor which he requested was, to be permitted to live free and independent in Venice during a year; at the end of which time he promised to name that employment which he esteemed the best adapted to his abilities and inclination.

Flodoardo was lodged in the magnificent palace of his good old patron Lomellino, where he lived in the closest retirement, studied the most valuable parts of ancient and modern literature, remained for whole days together in his own apartment, and was seldom to be seen in public, except upon some great solemnity.

But the Doge, Lomellino, Manfrone, and Conari, men, who had established the fame of Venice on so firm a basis, that it would require centuries to undermine it; men, in whose society one seemed to be withdrawn from the circle of ordinary mortals, and honored by the intercourse of superior beings; men who now graciously received the Florentine stranger into their intimacy, and resolved to spare no pains in forming him to support the character of a great man—it could not long escape the observation of men like these, that Flodoardo's gaiety was assumed, and that a secret sorrow preyed upon his heart.

In vain did Lomellino, who loved him like a father, endeavor to discover the source of his melancholy—in vain did the venerable Doge exert himself to disperse the gloom which oppressed his young favorite;—Flodoardo remained silent and sad.

And Rosabella—Rosabella would have belied her sex, had she remained gay while Flodoardo sorrowed. Her spirits were flown; her eyes were frequently obscured with tears. She grew daily paler; till the Doge who doated on her, was seriously alarmed for her health. At length Rosabella grew really ill: a fever fixed itself upon her: she became weak, and was confined to her chamber; and her complaint baffled the skill of the most experienced physicians in Venice.

In the midst of these unpleasant circumstances in which Andreas and his friends now found themselves, an accident occurred one morning, which raised their uneasiness to the very highest pitch. Never had so bold and audacious an action been heard of in Venice, as that which I am now going to relate.

The four banditti whom Flodoardo had seized, Petrino, Struzzo, Baluzzo, and Tomaso, had been safely committed to the Doge's dungeons, where they underwent a daily examination, and looked upon every sun that rose, as the last that would ever rise for them. Andreas and his confidential counsellors now flattered themselves that the public tranquillity had nothing to apprehend, and that Venice was completely purified of the miscreants, whom gold could bribe to be the instruments of revenge and cruelty—when, all at once, the following address was discovered affixed to most of the remarkable statues, and pasted against the corners of the principal streets, and pillars of the public buildings:

VENETIANS!

Struzzo, Tomaso, Petrino, Baluzzo, and Matteo, five as brave men as the world ever produced; who, had they stood at the head of armies, would have been called heroes, and now being called banditti, are fallen victims to the justice of state-policy—these men, it is true, exist for you no longer: but their place is supplied by him whose name is affixed to this paper, and who will stand by his employers with body and with soul! I laugh at the vigilance of the Venetian police; I laugh at the crafty and insolent Florentine, whose hand has dragged my brethren to the rack. Let those who need me, seek me; they will find me every where. Let those who search for me with the design of delivering me up to the law, despair and tremble; they will find me no where. But I shall find them, and that when they least expect me. Venetians, you understand me! Woe to the man who shall attempt to discover me; his life and death depend upon my pleasure. This comes from the Venetian Bravo,

ABÆLLINO.

"An hundred sequins," exclaimed the incensed Doge on reading the paper, "an hundred sequins to him who discovers this monster Abællino, and a thousand to him who delivers him up to justice!"

But in vain did spies ransack every lurking place in Venice: no Abællino was to be found. In vain did the luxurious, the avaricious and the hungry, stretch their wits to the uttermost, incited by the tempting promise of a thousand sequins—Abællino's prudence set all their ingenuity at defiance.

But not the less did every one assert that he had recognized Abællino, sometimes in one disguise, and sometimes in another; as an old man, a gondolier, a woman, or a monk. Every body had seen him somewhere; but unluckily nobody could tell where he was to be seen again.

Chap. IV.—The Violet.

I informed my readers, in the beginni
of the last chapter, that Flodoardo was b
come melancholy, and that Rosabella w indisposed; but I did not tell them what h occasioned this sudden change.

Flodoardo, who, on his first arrival
Venice, was all gaiety, and the life of ever society in which he mingled, lost his spir
on one particular day; and it so happene
that it was on the very same day that Ros
bella betrayed the first symptoms of indi position.

For on this unlucky day, did the capri
of accident, or perhaps the Goddess of Lov (who has her caprices too every now an then,) conduct Rosabella into her uncl garden, which none but the Doge's intim
friends were permitted to enter, and whe
the Doge himself frequently reposed in so tude and silence during the evening hou
of a sultry day.

Rosabella, lost in thought, wandered li less and unconscious along the broad a shady alleys of the garden. Sometim
in a moment of vexation, she plucked th unoffending leaves from the hedges, an strewed them upon the ground; sometim
she stopped suddenly, then rushed forwar with impetuosity, then again stood still, an gazed upon the clear blue heaven. Som nes her beautiful bosom was heaved with ick and irregular motion: and sometimes half suppressed sigh escaped from her lips coral.

"He is very handsome," she murmured, gazed with such eagerness on vacancy if she had seen something there which as hidden from the sight of common servers.

"Yet Camilla was in the right," she re-imed after a pause; and she frowned as if e had said Camilla was in the wrong.

This Camilla was her governess, her iend, her confident; I may almost say her other. Rosabella had lost her parents arly: her mother died when her child ould scarcely lisp her name; and her father, uiscardo of Corfu, the commander of a enetian vessel, eight years before, had erished in an engagement with the Turks, hile he was still in the prime of life. Ca-illa, one of the worthiest creatures that er dignified the name of woman, supplied Rosabella the place of a mother, had ought her up from infancy, and was now r best friend, and the person to whose ear e confided all her little secrets.

While Rosabella was still buried in her n reflections, the excellent Camilla ad-nced from a side path, and hastened to in her pupil. Rosabella started.

Rosabella.—Ah! dear Camilla, is it you? hat brings you hither?

Camilla.—You often call me your guardian angel, and guardian angels should always be near the object of their care.

Rosabella.—Camilla, I have been thinking over your arguments; I cannot deny that all you have said to me is very true, and very wise; but still——

Camilla.—But still, though your prudence agrees with me, your heart is of a contrary opinion.

Rosabella.—It is, indeed.

Camilla.—Nor do I blame your heart for differing from me, my poor girl. I have acknowledged to you without disguise, that were I at your time of life, and were such a man as Flodoardo to throw himself in my way, I could not receive his attentions with indifference. It cannot be denied, that this young stranger is uncommonly pleasing, and indeed for any woman whose heart is disengaged, an uncommonly dangerous companion. There is something very prepossessing in his appearance; his manners are elegant, and, short as has been his abode in Venice, it is already past doubting that there are many noble and striking features in his character. But, alas, after all, he is but a poor nobleman, and it is not very probable that the rich and powerful Doge of Venice will ever bestow his neice on one, who, to speak plainly, arrived here little better than a beggar. No, no, child, believe me; a romantic adventurer is no fit husband for Rosabella of Corfu.

Rosabella.—Dear Camilla, who was talking about husbands? What I feel for Flodoardo is merely affection, friendship——

Camilla.—Indeed? Then you would be perfectly satisfied, should some one of our wealthy ladies bestow her hand on Flodoardo?

Rosabella, (hastily.)—Oh! Flodoardo would not accept her hand, Camilla; of that I am sure.

Camilla.—Child! child! you would willingly deceive yourself. But be assured, that a girl who loves, ever connects (perhaps unconsciously) the wish for an eternal union with the idea of an eternal affection. Now this is a wish which you cannot indulge in regard to Flodoardo, without seriously offending your uncle, who, good man as he is, must still submit to the severe control of politics and etiquette.

Rosabella.—I know all that, Camilla; but can I not make you comprehend that I am not in love with Flodoardo, and do not mean to be in love with him, and that love has nothing at all to do in the business? I repeat to you, what I feel for him is nothing but sincere friendship; and surely Flodoardo deserves that I should feel that sentiment for him. Deserve it, said I? Oh! what does Flodoardo not deserve?

Camilla.—Aye! aye! friendship indeed—and love—Oh! Rosabella, you know not how often these deceivers borrow each ıer's mask to ensnare the hearts of unsuscting maidens! you know not how often

:e finds admission when wrapped in friendip's cloak, and that bosom, which, had he proached under his own appearance,
)uld have been closed against him forev-
! In short, my child, reflect how much u owe to your uncle; reflect how much easiness this inclination would cost him,
d sacrifice to duty what at present is a
:re caprice, but which, if encouraged, ght make too deep an impression on your art to be afterwards removed by your best orts.

Rosabella.—You say right, Camilla; I
lly believe myself that my prepossession Flodoardo's favor is merely an accidental
cy, of which I shall easily get the better.
no; I am not in love with Flodoardo, o
you may rest assured; I even think that her feel an antipathy towards him, since have shewn me the possibility of his ing me prove a cause of uneasiness to kind, my excellent uncle.

milla, (smiling.)—Are your sentiments
ity and gratitude so very strong?

sabella.—Oh! that they are, Camilla,
so you will say yourself hereafter.—
disagreeable Flodoardo—to give me so vexation! I wish he had never come nice! I declare I do not like him at all!

nilla.—No? What? Not like Flodoar-

Rosabella, (casting down her eyes.)—No; not at all—not that I wish him ill either; for you know, Camilla, there's no reason why I should hate this poor Flodoardo?

Camilla.—Well, we will resume this subject when I return; I have business, and the gondola waits for me. Farewell, my child, and do not lay aside your resolution as hastily as you took it up.

Camilla departed; and Rosabella remained melancholy and uncertain; she built castles in the air, and destroyed them as soon as built; she formed wishes, and condemned herself for having formed them; she looked round her frequently in search of something, but dared not confess to herself what it was of which she was in search.

The evening was sultry, and Rosabella was compelled to shelter herself from the sun's overpowering heat. In the garden was a small fountain, bordered by a bank of moss, over which the magic hands of art and nature had formed a canopy of ivy and jessamine. Thither she bent her steps; she arrived at the fountain—and instantly drew back, covered with blushes—for on the bank of moss, shaded by the protecting canopy, whose waving blossoms were reflected on the fountain, Flodoardo was seated, and his eyes fixed on a roll of parchment.

Rosabella hesitated whether she should retire or stay. Flodoardo started from his place, apparently in no less confusion than herself, and relieved her from her indecision, by taking her hand with respect, and conducting her to the seat which he had just quitted.

Now then she could not possibly retire immediately, unless she meant to violate every common principle of good breeding.

Her hand was still clasped in Flodoardo's. But it was so natural for him to take it, that she could not blame him for having done so. But what was she next to do? Draw her hand away? Why should she, since he did her hand no harm by keeping it, and the keeping it seemed to make him so happy! And how could the gentle Rosabella resolve to commit an act of such unheard of cruelty, as wilfully to deprive any one of a pleasure which made him so happy, and which did herself no harm?

"Signiora," said Flodoardo, merely for the sake of saying something, "you do well to enjoy the open air; the evening is beautiful."

"But I interrupt your studies, my lord?" said Rosabella.

"By no means," answered Flodoardo; and there this interesting conversation came to a full stop. Both looked down; both examined the heaven and the earth, the trees and the flowers, in the hopes of finding some hints for renewing the conversation; but the more anxiously they sought them, the more difficult did it seem to find that they sought: and in this painful embarrassment did two whole precious minutes lapse!

"Ah! what a beautiful flower!" suddenly cried Rosabella, in order to break the silence; then stooped and plucked a violet with an appearance of the greatest eagerness; though in fact nothing at that moment could have been more a matter of indifference.

"It is a very beautiful flower, indeed!" gravely observed Flodoardo, and was out of all patience with himself for having made so flat a speech.

"Nothing can surpass this purple!" continued Rosabella; "red and blue so happily blended, that no painter could produce so perfect a union!"

"Red and blue? the one the symbol of happiness; the other, of affection. Ah! Rosabella, how enviable will be that man's lot on whom your hand should bestow such a flower! Happiness and affection are more inseparably united than the red and blue which purple that violet!"

"You seem to attach a value to the flower of which it is but little deserving."

"Might I but knew on whom Rosabella will one day bestow what that flower expresses—yet this is a subject which I have no right to discuss; I know not what has happened to me to-day—I make nothing but blunders and mistakes. Forgive my prsumption, lady; I will hazard such forward inquiries no more.

He was silent; Rosabella was silent also. All was calm and hushed, except in the hearts of the lovers.

But though they could forbid their lips to betray their hidden affection; though Rosabella's tongue said not, 'Thou art he, Flodoardo, on whom this flower should be bestowed;' though Flodoardo's words had not expressed, 'Rosabella, give me that violet, and that which it implies;' yet their eyes were not silent. Those treacherous interpreters of secret feelings acknowledged more to each other than their hearts had yet acknowledged to themselves!

Flodoardo and Rosabella gazed on each other with looks which made all speech unnecessary. Sweet, tender, and enthusiastic was the smile which played round Rosabella's lips, when her eyes met those of the youth whom she had selected from the rest of mankind; and with mingled emotions of hope and fear did the youth study the meaning of that smile. He understood it, and his heart beat brighter.

Rosabella trembled; her eyes could no longer sustain the fire of his glances, and a modest blush overspread her face and bosom.

"Rosabella!" at length murmured Flodoardo, unconsciously. "Flodoardo!" sighed Rosabella in the same tone.

"Give me that violet," he exclaimed eagerly, then sank at her feet, and in a tone of the most humble supplication repeated—"Oh! give it to me!"

Rosabella held the flower fast.

"Ask for what thou wilt; if a throne can purchase it, I will pay that price, or perish! Rosabella, give me that flower."

She stole one look at the handsome suppliant, and dared not hazard a second.

"My repose, my happiness, my life, nay, even my glory, all depend on the possession of that little flower! Let that be mine, and here I solemnly renounce all else which the world calls precious."

The flower trembled in her snowy hands; her fingers clasped it less firmly.

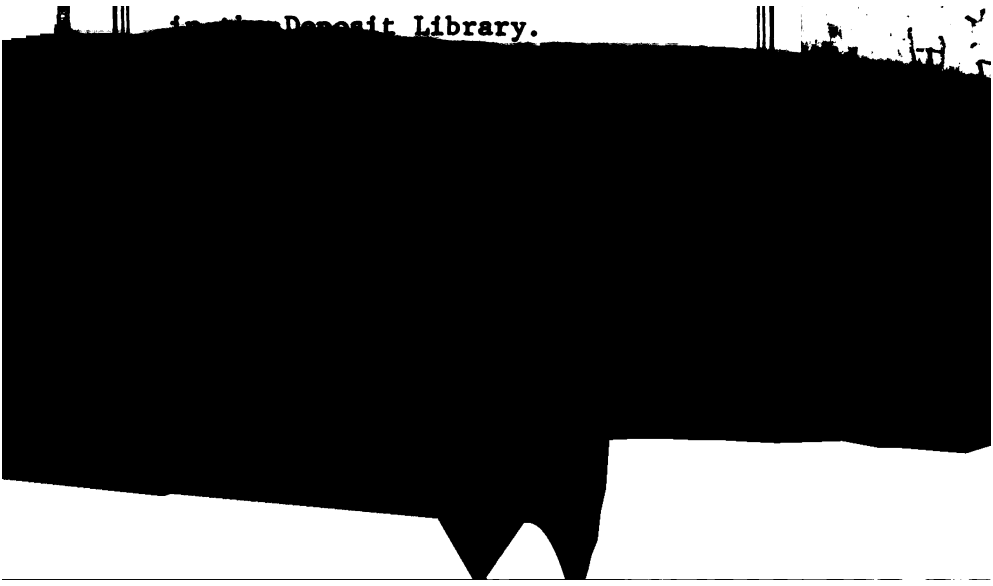
"You hear me, Rosabella? I kneel at your feet, and am I then in vain a beggar?"

The word beggar recalled to her memory Camilla and her prudent counsels. 'What am I doing?' she said to herself; 'have I forgotten my promise—my resolution? Fly, Rosabella, fly, or this hour makes you faithless to yourself and duty!'

She tore the flower to pieces, and threw it contemptuously on the ground. "I understand you, Flodoardo," said she; "and having understood you, will never suffer this subject to be renewed. Here let us part, and let me not again be offended by a similar presumption. Farewell!"

She turned from him with disdain, and left Flodoardo rooted to his place with sorrow and astonishment.

Deposit Library.



derstood that an extraordinary alteration
d taken place in Flodoardo's manner and pearance; that he had withdrawn himself
m all general society, and that when the citations of his intimate friends compell-
him to appear in their circle, his spirits med evidently depressed by the weight
n unconquerable melancholy.

This intelligence was like the stroke of a gnard to the feeling heart of Rosabella.
She fled for shelter to the solitude of her chamber, there indulged her feelings without restraint, and lamented with showers of pentant tears, her harsh treatment of Floardo.

The grief which preyed in secret on her l, soon undermined her health. No one ld relieve her sufferings, for no one knew cause of her melancholy, or the origin er illness. No wonder then that Rosa-la's situation at length excited the most er anxiety in the bosom of her venera-uncle. No wonder, too, that Flodoardo irely withdrew himself from a world
hich was become odious to him, since Ro-bella was to be seen in it no longer; and t he devoted himself in solitude to the lgence of a passion, which he had vainly eavored to subdue; and which, in the etuosity of its course, had already swal-ed up every other sentiment.

But let us for a moment turn from the chamber of Rosabella, and visit the dwelling of the conspirators, who were vancing with rapid strides towards the cution of their plans; and who, with ev hour that past over their heads, became m numerous, more powerful and dangerous

Andreas and his beloved republic.

Parozzi, Memmo, Contarino, and Falie
(the chiefs of this desperate undertaki now assembled frequently in the Cardi Gonzaga's palace, where the different pla
for altering the constitution of Venice wer brought forward and discussed. But in a these different schemes it was evident tha
the proposer was solely actuated by con siderations of private interest. The obje of one was to get free from the burthen enormous debts; another was willing to s crifice every thing to gratify his inordin ambition; the cupidity of this man was cited by the treasures of Andreas and friends; while that was actuated by reso ment of some fancied offence, a resentme which could only be quenched with the fender's blood.

These execrable wretches, who aimed nothing less than the total overthrow of nice, or at least of her government, look towards the completion of their extravaga hopes with the greater confidence, since
new but necessary addition to the alread existing taxes had put the Venetian popu lace out of humor with their rulers.

Rich enough both in adherents and i

lth, to realize their fearful projects; rich ugh in bold, shrewd, desperate men, ose minds were well adapted to the con- ance and execution of revolutionary pro- s; they now looked down with contempt n the good old Doge, who as yet discov- d no suspicion of the object of their noc- al meetings.

till did they not dare to carry their pro- s into effect till some principal persons he state should be prevented by death m throwing obstacles in their way. For accomplishment of this part of their plan y relied on the daggers of the banditti. eadful, therefore, was the sound in their s, when the bell gave the signal for exe- ion, and they saw their best founded es expire on the scaffold which support- he headless trunks of the four Bravos. if their consternation was great at thus g the destined instruments of their de- s, how extravagant was their joy when proud Abællino dared openly to declare enice, that he still inhabited the repub- nd that he still wore a dagger at the sal of vice.

This desperado is the very man for us!" exclaimed unanimously, and in rap- and now their most ardent wish was rol Abællino in their service.

hat object was soon obtained—they ht the daring ruffian, and he suffered elf to be found. He visited their meetings, but in his promises and demands h was equally extravagant.

The first and most earnest wish of th
whole conspiracy was the death of Conar
the Procurator; a man whom the Doge val ued beyond all others; a man, whose eagl eyes made the conspirators hourly tremble
for their secret, and whose services the Do had accepted, in preference to those of th Cardinal Gonzaga. But the sum which Abællino demanded for the murder of thi
one man was enormous. "Give me the re ward which I require," said he, "and I promise, on the word of a man of hono
that after this night the Procurator Cona shall give you no further trouble. Exal him to heaven, or imprison him in hell, I'l engage to find and stab him."

What could they do? Abællino was not man to be easily beat down in his demand
The Cardinal was impatient to attain th summit of his wishes; but his road w straight over Conari's grave!

Abællino received the sum demanded;
on the next day the venerable Conari, th Doge's best and dearest friend, the pri
and safeguard of the republic, was no lo numbered among the living.

"'Tis a terrible fellow, this Abællin cried the conspirators when the news reach them, and celebrated the Procurator's de in triumph at the Cardinal's midnight fe

The Doge was almost distracted w ror and astonishment. He engaged to e ten thousand sequins to any one who uld discover by whom Conari had been oved from the world. A proclamation his effect was published at the corner of y street in Venice, and made known ughout the territories of the republic.

w days after this proclamation had been
e, the following paper was discovered
ed to the principal door of the Venetian gubra:

VENETIANS!

You would fain know the author of Conari's
th: to spare you much useless trouble, I herecknowledge that I, Abællino, was his assassin.
ce did I bury my dagger in his heart, and sent his body to feed fishes. The Doge omises ten thousand sequins to him who shall over Conari's murderer; and to him who shall clever enough to seize him, Abællino promises
nty. Adieu, Signors. I remain your faithful vant,
ABÆLLINO.

CHAP. VI.—The two greatest men in Venice.

It must be superfluous to inform my reads that all Venice became furious at this new olence. Within the memory of man had one ever treated with such derision the lebrated Venetian police, or set the Doge's wer at defiance, with such proud temer-
y. This occurrence threw the whole city into confusion: every one was on the

out; the patroles were doubled; the s extended their researches on all sides;
no one could see, or hear, or discover
most distant trace of Abællino.

The priests in their prayers stro rouse the slumbering vengeance of he to crush this insolent offender; the l
were ready to swoon at the very nam Abællino, for who could assure them th
some unexpected moment he might not them the same compliment which he paid to Rosabella? As for the old wo they unanimously asserted that Abæl had sold himself to the Prince of dark
by whose assistance he was enabled to s
with the patience of all pious Venetian and deride the impotence of their just dignation. The Cardinal and his assoc were proud of their terrible confede
and looked forward with confidence triumphant issue of their undertaking.
deserted family of Conari called d curses on his murderer's head, and wi that their tears might be turned into of sulphur, in whose waves they plunge the monster Abællino; nor did ari's relations feel more grief for hi
than the Doge and his two confidants, swore never to rest till they had disco
the lurking place of the ruthless as
and had punished his crimes with te vengeance.

"Yet, after all," said Andreas one evening, as he sat alone in his private chamber, after all, it must be confessed that this Abællino is a singular man. He who can do what Abællino has done, must possess both such talents and such courage as, (stood he at the head of an army) would enable him to conquer half the world! Would that I could once get a sight of him!"—

"Look up then!" roared Abællino, and clapped the Doge on the shoulder. Andreas started from his seat. A colossal figure stood before him, wrapped in a dark mantle, above which appeared a countenance so hideous and forbidding, that the universe could not have produced its equal.

"Who art thou?" stammered out the Doge.

"Thou seest me, and canst doubt? Well then, I am Abællino, the good friend of your murdered Conari, and the republic's most submissive servant."

The brave Andreas, who had never trembled in fight by land or by sea, and for whom no danger had possessed terrors sufficient to shake his undaunted resolution, the brave Andreas now forgot for a few moments his usual presence of mind. Speechless did he gaze on the daring assassin, who stood before him calm and haughty, unappalled by the majesty of the greatest man in Venice.

Abællino nodded to him with an air of familiar protection, and graciously condescended to grin upon him with a kind o half friendly smile.

"Abællino," said the Doge at length, en deavouring to recollect himself, "thou ar
a fearful—a detestable man!"

"Fearful!" answered the Bravo; "does thou think me so? Good! that glads me in the very heart. Detestable? that may be so, or it may not. I confess the sign which I hang out gives no great promise of good entertainment within; but yet, Andreas, one thing is certain, you and I stand on the same line, for at this moment we are the two greatest men in Venice; you in your way,
I in mine."

The Doge could not help smiling at the Bravo's familiar tone.

"Nay, nay!" continued Abællino; "no smiles of disbelief, if you please. Allow me, though a bravo, to compare myself to a Doge; truly I think there's no great presumption in placing myself on a level with a man whom I hold in my power, and therefore is in fact beneath me."

The Doge made a movement as if he would have left him.

"Not so fast," said Abællino, laughing
rudely, and he barred the Doge's passage.
"Accident seldom unites in so small a space
as this chamber a pair of such great men.
Stay where you are, for I have not done
with you yet: we must have a little conver-
"

"Hear me, Abællino!" said the Doge, mustering up all the dignity he possessed; "thou hast received great talents from nature, why dost thou employ them to so little advantage? I here promise you on my most sacred word, pardon for the past, and protection for the future, if you name to me the villain who bribed you to assassinate Conari, abjure your trade, and accept an honest employment in the service of the republic. If this offer is rejected, at least quit with all speed the territory of Venice, or I swear——"

"Ho! ho!" interrupted Abællino; "pardon and protection, say you? It is long since I thought it worth my while to care for such trifles. Abællino is able to protect himself without foreign aid; and as to pardon, mortals cannot give absolution for sins like mine. On that day, when all men must give in the list of their offences, then too will I give in mine, but till then, never! You would know the name of him who bribed me to murder Conari? Well, well, you shall know it—but not to-day. I must quit with all speed the Venetian territory? and wherefore? through fear of thee? Ho! ho! through fear of Venice? Ha! Abællino fears not Venice; 'tis Venice that fears Abællino! You would have me abjure my profession? Well, Andreas, there is one condition, which, perhaps——"

"Name it," cried the Doge eagerly; "will ten thousand sequins purchase your departure from the republic?"

Abœllino.—I would gladly give twice as much myself, could you recal the insult of offering Abællino so miserable a bribe. No, Andreas, but one price can pay me; give me your neice for my bride; I love Rosabella, the daughter of Guiscard of Corfu.

Andreas.—Monster, what insolence!

Abœllino.—Ho! ho! Patience, patience, good uncle that is to be! Will you accept my terms?

Andreas.—Name what sum can satisfy you, and it shall be yours this instant, so you will only relieve Venice from your presence. Though it should cost the republic a million, she will be a gainer, if her air is no longer poisoned by your breath.

Abœllino.—Indeed? Why, in fact, a million is not so great a sum; for, look ye, Andreas, I have just sold, for near half a million, the lives of your two dear friends, Manfrone and Lomellino. Now give me Rosabella, and I break the bargain.

Andreas.—Miscreant! Has Heaven no lightnings?

Abœllino.—You will not? Mark me! In four and twenty hours shall Manfrone and Lomellino be food for fishes. Abællino has said it! Away!

And with these words he drew a pistol from under his cloak, and flashed it in the [illegible]'s face. Blinded by the powder, and confused by the unexpected explosion, Andreas started back, and sank bewildered on a neighboring sofa. He soon recovered from his astonishment; he sprang from his seat to summon his guards, and seize Abællino. But Abællino had already disappeared.

On that same evening were Parozzi and his confederates assembled in the palace of the Cardinal Gonzaga. The table was spread with the most luxurious profusion. and they arranged over their flowing goblets plans for the republic's ruin. The Cardinal related how he had of late contrived to insinuate himself into the Doge's good graces, and had succeeded in impressing him with an opinion that the chiefs of the confederacy were fit men to hold offices of important trust. Contarino boasted that he doubted not before long to be appointed to the vacant Procuratorship. Parozzi reckoned for his share upon Rosabella's hand, and the place of either Lomellino or Manfrone, when once those two chief obstacles to his hopes should be removed. Such was the conversation in which they were engaged, when the clock struck twelve, the door flew wide open, and Abællino stood before them!

"Wine there!" cried he; "the work is done. Manfrone and Lomellino are at supper with the worms."

All sprang from their seats in rapture and astonishment.

"And I have thrown the Doge himself into such a fit of terror, that I warrant you he will not recover himself easily. Now answer; are you content with me, you blood hounds?"

"Next then for Flodoardo!" shouted Prozzi.

"Flodoardo!" muttered Abællino between his teeth; "hum! hum! that's not so easy."

BOOK III.

CHAP. I.—The Lovers.

ROSABELLA, the idol of Venice, lay on the bed of sickness; a sorrow, whose cause was carefully concealed from every one, undermined her health, and destroyed the bloom of her beauty. She loved the noble Flodoardo; and who would have known Flodoardo, and not have loved him? His majestic stature, his expressive countenance, his enthusiastic glance, his whole being declared aloud, "Flodoardo is nature's favorite!" and Rosabella had been always a great admirer of nature.

But if Rosabella was ill, Flodoardo was scarcely better. He confined himself to his own apartment; he shunned society, and frequently made long journeys to different cities of the republic, in hopes of distracting his thoughts by change of place from that object which, wherever he went, still pursued him. He had now been absent for three whole weeks. No one knew in what quarter he was wandering; and it was during this absence that the so long expected Prince of Monaldeschi arrived at Venice, to claim Rosabella as his bride.

His appearance, to which a month before Andreas looked forward with such pleasing expectation, now afforded but little satisfaction to the Doge. Rosabella was too ill to receive her suitor's visits, and he did not allow her much time to recover her health; for six days after his arrival at Venice, the Prince was found murdered in a retired part of one of the public gardens. His sword lay by him unsheathed and bloody; his tablets were gone, but one leaf had been torn from them, and fastened on his breast. It was examined, and found to contain the following lines, apparently written in blood:

Let no one pretend to Rosabella's hand, who is not prepared to share the fate of Monaldeschi
The Bravo, ABÆLLINO.

"Oh! where shall I now fly for comfort, for protection?" exclaimed the Doge in despair, when this dreadful news was announced; "why, why is Flodoardo absent?"

Anxiously did he now desire the youth's return, to support him under the weight of these heavy misfortunes; nor was it long before that desire was gratified; Flodoardo returned.

"Welcome, noble youth!" said the Doge, when he saw the Florentine enter his apartment; "you must not in future deprive me of your presence for so long. I am now a poor, forsaken old man. You have heard that Lomellino—that Manfrone—"

"I know all," answered Flodoardo with a melancholy air.

"Satan has burst his chains, and now inhabits Venice under the name of Abællino, robbing me of all that my soul holds precious. Flodoardo, for heaven's love, be cautious; often, during your absence, have I trembled lest the miscreant's dagger should have deprived me too of you. I have much to say to you, my young friend, but I must defer it till the evening; a foreigner of consequence has appointed this hour for an audience, and I must hasten to receive him. But in the evening—"

He was interrupted by the appearance of Rosabella, who with tottering steps and pale cheeks, advanced slowly into the apartment. She saw Flodoardo, and a faint blush overspread her countenance. Flodoardo rose from his seat, and welcomed her with an air of distant respect.

"Do not go yet," said the Doge; "perhaps in half an hour I may be at liberty. In the mean while I leave you to entertain my poor Rosabella: she has been very ill during your absence, and I am still uneasy about her health. She kept her bed till yesterday and truly I think she has left it too soon."

The venerable Doge quitted the apartment, and the lovers once more found themselves alone. Rosabella drew near the window; Flodoardo at length ventured to approach it also.

"Signora," said he, "are you still angry with me?"

"I am not angry with you," stammered out Rosabella, and blushed as she recollected the garden scene.

"And you have quite forgotten my transgression?"

"Your transgression?" repeated Rosabella with a faint smile; "yes, if it was a transgression, I have quite forgiven it. Dying people ought to pardon those who have trespassed against them, in order that they in their turn may be pardoned their trespasses against heaven; and I am dying; I feel it!"

"Signora!"

"Nay, 'tis past a doubt. It is true I have quitted my sick bed since yesterday; but I know well that I am soon to return to it, never to leave it more. And therefore—therefore I now ask your pardon, Signor, for the vexation which I was obliged to cause you the last time we met."

Flodoardo replied not.

"Will you not forgive me? You must be very difficult to appease—very revengeful!"

Flodoardo fixed his eyes on her countenance with a melancholy smile.—Rosabella extended her hand towards him.

"Will you refuse my offered hand? Shall all be forgotten?"

"Forgotten, lady? never! never! Every word and look of yours is stamped on my memory, never to be effaced. I cannot forget a transaction in which you bore a part; I cannot forget the scene that passed between us—every circumstance is too precious and sacred As to pardon—" He took her extended hand, and pressed it respectfully to his lips. "I would to heaven, dear lady, that you had in truth injured me much, that I might have much to forgive you. Alas! I have at present nothing to pardon."

Both were now silent; at length Rosabella resumed the conversation by saying—"You have made a long absence from Venice; did you travel far?"

"I did."

"And received much pleasure from your journey?"

"Much; for every where I heard the praise of Rosabella."

"Count Flodoardo!" she interrupted him with a look of reprehension, but in a gentle voice, "would you again offend me?"

"That will soon be out of my power.—Perhaps you can guess what are my present intentions."

"To resume your travels soon?"

"Exactly so; and the next time that I quit Venice, to return to it no more."

"No more!" she repeated eagerly; "Oh! not so, Flodoardo! Ah! can you leave me?"—She stopped, ashamed of her imprudence.

—Can you leave my uncle, I meant to say? You do but jest, I doubt not."

"By my honor, lady, I never was more in earnest."

"And whither then do you mean to go?"

"To Malta, and assist the knights in their attack upon the corsairs of Barbary. Providence perhaps may enable me to obtain the command of a galley; then will I call my vessel "Rosabella;" then shall the war-cry be still Rosabella; that name will render me invincible!"

"Oh, this is mockery, Count: I have not deserved that you should sport with my feelings so cruelly."

"It is to spare your feelings, Signora, that I am now resolved to fly from Venice; my presence might cause you some uneasy moments; I am not the happy man whose sight is destined to give you pleasure; I will at least avoid giving you pain!"

"And you really can resolve to abandon the Doge, whose esteem for you is so sincere, whose friendship has always been so warm?"

"I value his friendship highly; but it is not sufficient to make me happy; and could he lay kingdoms at my feet, still would his friendship be insufficient to make me happy."

"Does then your happiness require so much?"

'It does; much more than I have mention- nfinitely more! But one boon can nake me happy—I have begged for it ny knees." He caught her hand, a rest it eagerly to his lips—"I have begg or it, Rosabella,—and my suit has be rejected!"

"You are a strange enthusiast!" she sa
with difficulty, and scarcely knew what s
said; while Flodoardo drew her gent nearer to him, and murmured in a supp
cating voice, "Rosabella!"

"What would you of me?"

"My happiness."

She gazed upon him for a moment und cided, then hastily drew away her han
and exclaimed, "Leave me this moment, command you! Leave me, for heaven's sake

Flodoardo clasped his hands together despair and anguish—he bowed his head token of obedience; he left her with sl steps and a melancholy air, and as he pas
the threshold, turned to bid her farew forever. Suddenly she rushed towards h caught his hand, and pressed it to her he "Flodoardo!" she cried, "I am thine!"
sank motionless at his feet.

CHAP. II.—A dangerous Promise.

And now who was so blest as the f nate Flodoardo? The victory was his
he had heard the wished-for sentence

nounced by the lips of Rosabella. He raised her from the ground, and placed her on a sofa. Her blue eyes soon unclosed of themselves once more, and the first object which they beheld was Flodoardo kneeling at her feet, while with one arm he encircled her waist. Her head sank upon the shoulder of the man for whom she had wept so many tears, for whom she had breathed so many sighs, who had occupied so many of her thoughts by day, who had been present in so many of her dreams by night.

As they gazed in silent rapture on each other, they forgot that they were mortals: they seemed transported to a happier, a better world: Rosabella thought that the chamber in which she sat was transformed into an earthly paradise: invisible seraphs seemed to hallow by their protecting presence the indulgence of her innocent affection, and she poured forth her secret thanks to Him who had given her a heart susceptible of love.

Through the whole course of man's existence such a moment as this occurs but once. Happy is he, who, when it arrives, has a soul worthy of its enjoyment; happy is he who sighs for its arrival; happy is even he for whom that moment has long been past, so it past not unenjoyed, for the recollection of it still is precious. Sage philosophers, in vain do you assure us that the raptures of a moment like this are mere illusions of a imagination, scarcely more solid than an enchanting dream, which fades before the sunbeams of truth and reason. Alas! does there exist a happiness under the moon which owes not its charms, in some degree, to the magic of imagination?

"You are dear to me, Flodoardo!" murmured Rosabella, for Camilla and her counsels were quite forgotten; "oh, you are very dear!"

The youth only thanked her by clasping her still closer to his bosom, while, for the first time, he sealed her coral lips with his.

At that moment the door was suddenly thrown open; the Doge Andreas re-entered the apartment; the expected stranger had been suddenly taken ill, and Andreas was no sooner at liberty than he hastened to rejoin his favorite. The rustling of his garments roused the lovers from their dream of bliss. Rosabella started from Flodoardo's embrace with a cry of terror; Flodoardo quitted his kneeling posture, yet seemed by no means disconcerted at the discovery.

Andreas gazed on them for some minutes with a look which expressed at once anger, melancholy, and the most heart-felt disappointment. He sighed deeply, cast his eyes towards heaven, and in silence turned to leave the apartment.

"Stay yet one moment, noble Andreas," cried the Florentine.

The Doge turned, and Flodoardo threw himself at his feet. Andreas looked down with calm and serious dignity on the kneeling offender, by whom his friendship had been so unworthily rewarded, and by whom his confidence had been so cruelly betrayed.

"Young man," said he, in a stern voice, "the attempt to excuse yourself must be fruitless."

"Excuse myself!' interrupted Flodoardo boldly; "no, my lord, I need no excuse for loving Rosabella—'twere for him to excuse himself who had seen Rosabella, and not loved her. Yet if it is indeed a crime in me that I adore Rosabella, it is a crime of which heaven itself will absolve me, since it formed Rosabella so worthy to be adored!"

"You seem to lay much stress on this fantastic apology," answered the Doge contemptuously; "at least you cannot expect that it should have much weight with me."

"I say it once more, my lord," resumed Flodoardo, while he rose from the ground, "that I intend to make no apology. I mean not to excuse my love for Rosabella, but to request your approbation of that love:—Andreas, I adore your neice; I demand her for my bride!"

The Doge started in astonishment at this bold and unexpected request.

"It is true," continued the Florentine, "I am no more than a needy, unknown youth, and it seems a piece of strange temerity when such a man proposes himself to es'se the heiress of the Venetian Doge.

But, by heaven, I am confident that the great Andreas means not to bestow his Rosabella on one of those whose claims to favor are overflowing coffers, extensive territories, and sounding titles, or who vainly decorate their insignificance with the glory obtained by their ancestors; glory of which they are themselves incapable of acquiring a single ray. I acknowledge freely that I have as yet performed no actions which make me deserving such a reward as Rosabella; but it shall not be long ere I will perform such actions, or perish in the attempt."

The Doge turned from him with a look of displeasure.

"O be not incensed with him, dear uncle!" said Rosabella: she hastened to detain the Doge, threw her white arms round his neck fondly, and concealed in his bosom the tears with which her countenance was bedewed.

"Make your demands!" continued Flodoardo, still addressing himself to the Doge; "say what you wish me to do, and what you would have me become, in order to obtain from you the hand of Rosabella. Ask what you will, I will look on the task, however difficult, as nothing more than sport and pastime. By heaven, I would that Venice were at this moment exposed to the most eminent danger, and that ten thousand daggers were unsheathed against your life; Rosabella my reward, how certain should I be to rescue Venice, and strike the ten t[illegible] daggers down!"

"I have served the republic faithfully and fervently for many a long year," answered Andreas with a bitter smile; "I have risqued my life without hesitation; I have shed my blood with profusion! I asked nothing for my reward but to pass my old age in soft tranquillity, and of this reward have I been cheated. My bosom-friends, the companions of my youth, the confidents of my age, have been torn from me by the daggers of banditti—and you, Flodoardo, you on whom I heaped all favors, have now deprived me of this, my only last remaining comfort. Answer me, Rosabella; hast thou in truth bestowed thy heart on Flodoardo irrevocably?" .

One hand of Rosabella's still rested on her uncle's shoulder; with the other she clasped Flodoardo's, and pressed it fondly against her heart—yet Flodoardo seemed still unsatisfied. No sooner had the Doge's question struck his ear, than his countenance became dejected; and though his hand returned the pressure of Rosabella's, he shook his head mournfully, with an air of doubt, and cast upon her a penetrating look, as he would have read her inmost soul.

Andreas withdrew himself gently from Rosabella's arms, and for some time paced the apartment slowly, with a countenance sad and earnest. Rosabella sank upon a which stood near her, and wept. Flo- eyed the Doge, and waited for his with impatience.

Thus passed some minutes. An awful silence reigned through the chamber:—Andreas seemed to be laboring with some resolution of dreadful importance. The lovers wished, yet dreaded, the conclusion of the scene, and with every moment their anxiety became more painful.

"Flodoardo," at length said the Doge, and suddenly stood still in the middle of the chamber. Flodoardo advanced with a respectful air "Young man," he continued, "I am at length resolved; Rosabella loves you, nor will I oppose the decision of her heart—but Rosabella is much too precious to admit of my bestowing her on the first who thinks fit to demand her—the man to whom I give her, must be worthy such a gift: she must be the reward of his services; nor can he do services so great that such a reward will not overpay them. Your claims on the republic's gratitude are as yet but trifling; an opportunity now offers of rendering us an essential service—the murderer of Conari, Manfrone, and Lomellino—go, bring him hither! Alive or dead, thou must bring to this palace the terrible banditti king, Abællino!"

At this unexpected conclusion of a speech on which his happiness or despair depended, Flodoardo started back; the color fled from his cheeks.

"My noble lord," he said at length hesitating, "you know well that——"

"I know well," interrupted Andre
"how difficult a task I enjoin, when I r
quire the delivery of Abællino. For mys
I swear, that I had rather a thousand tim force my passage with a single vessel throu
the whole Turkish fleet, and carry off Admiral's ship from the midst of them, th attempt to seize this Abællino, who seem have entered into a compact with Luci himself; who is to be found every whe
and no where; whom so many have see but whom no one knows; whose cautio
subtlety has brought to shame the vigilan
of our state-inquisitors, of the College
Ten, and of all their legion of spies and sbi
ri; whose very name strikes terror into t hearts of the bravest Venetians, and fr whose dagger I myself am not safe upon throne! I know well, Flodoardo, ho much I proffer—you seem irresolute?—Y are silent! Flodoardo, I have long watch you with attention; I have discovered
you marks of a superior genius, and ther fore I am induced to make such a deman
If any one is able to cope with Abællin
thou art the man—I wait your answer.'

Flodoardo paced the chamber in silenc
Dreadful was the enterprize proposed: wo
to him should Abællino discover his pu pose!—But Rosabella was the reward!
a look on the beloved one, and resolv risk every thing.
advanced towards the Doge.

Andreas.—Now then, Flodoardo, your resolution?

Flodoardo.—Should I deliver Abællino to your power, do you solemnly swear that Rosabella shall be my bride?

Andreas.—She shall, and not till then.

Rosabella.—Ah, Flodoardo, I fear this undertaking will end fatally. Abællino is so crafty—so dreadful—Oh! look well to yourself; for should you meet with this detested monster, whose dagger—

Flodoardo, (interrupting her hastily.)—Oh! silence, Rosabella!—at least allow me to hope!—Noble Andreas, give me your hand, and pledge your princely word, that Abællino once in your power, nothing shall prevent me from being Rosabella's husband.

Andreas.—I swear it: deliver into my power, either alive or dead, this most dangerous foe of Venice, and nothing shall prevent Rosabella from being your wife. In pledge of which I here give you my princely hand.

Flodoardo grasped the Doge's hand in silence, and shook it thrice. He turned to Rosabella, and seemed on the point of addressing her, when he suddenly turned away, struck his forehead, and measured the apartment with disordered and unsteady steps. The clock in the tower of St. Mark's church struck five.

"Time flies!" cried Flodoardo; "no more delay then. In four and twenty hours will

I produce in this very palace this dreadful bravo, Abællino."

Andreas shook his head. "Young man," said he, "be less confident in your promises; I shall have more faith in your performance."

Flodoardo, (serious and firm.)—Let things terminate as they may, either I will keep my word, or never again cross the threshold of your palace. I have discovered some traces of the miscreant, and I trust that I shall amuse you to-morrow, at this time and in this place, with the representation of a comedy; but should it prove a tragedy instead, God's will be done.

Andreas.—Remember that too much haste is dangerous; rashness will destroy even the frail hopes of success, in which you may reasonable indulge at present.

Flodoardo.—Rashness, my lord? He who has lived as I have lived, and suffered what I have suffered, must have been long since cured of rashness.

Rosabella, (taking his hand.)—Yet be not too confident of your own strength, I beseech you. Dear Flodoardo, my uncle loves you, and his advice is wise:—beware of Abællino's dagger!

Flodoardo.—The best way to escape his dagger is not to allow him time to use it: within four and twenty hours must the deed [illegible]ne, or never. Now then, illustrious I take my leave of you; to-morrow doubt not to convince you that nothing is too much for love to venture.

Andreas.—Right; to venture—but to achieve—

Flodoardo.—Ah! that must depend——

He paused suddenly; again his eyes were fastened eagerly on those of Rosabella; and it was evident that with every moment his uneasiness acquired fresh strength. He resumed his discourse to Andreas, with a movement of impatience.

"Noble Andreas," said he, "do not make me dispirited; rather let me try whether I cannot inspire you with more confidence of my success. I must first request you to order a splendid entertainment to be prepared. At this hour in the afternoon of to-morrow let me find all the principal persons in Venice, both men and women, assembled in this chamber; for should my hopes be realized, I would willingly have spectators of my triumph. Particularly let the venerable members of the College of Ten be invited, in order that they may at last be brought face to face with this terrible Abællino, against whom they have so long been engaged in fruitless warfare.

Andreas, (after eyeing him some time with a look of mingled surprise and uncertainty.)—They shall be present.

Flodoardo.—I understand also, that since Conari's death, you have been reconciled to the Cardinal Gonzaga; and that he has

vinced you how unjust were the prejudice
with which Conari had inspired you again
the nobili Parozzi, Contarino, and the re
of that society. During my late excursio
I have heard much in praise of these young men, which makes me wish to show myself
to them in a favorable light—if you have no objection, let me beg you to invite them also.

Andreas.—You shall be gratified.

Flodoardo.—One thing more, which had nearly escaped my memory. Let no one know the motive of this entertainment, till the whole company is assembled. Then let guards be placed around the palace, and indeed it may be as well to place them even before the doors of the saloon; for in truth
this Abællino is such a desperate villain, that too many precautions cannot be taken against him. The sentinels must have their pieces loaded; and, above all things, they must be strictly charged, on pain of death, to let every one enter, but no one quit the chamber.

Andreas.—All this shall be done punc tually.

Flodoardo.—I have nothing more to say Noble Andreas, farewell. Rosabella, to morrow, when the clock strikes five, we shall meet again—or never!

He said, and rushed out of the apartme
Andreas shook his head; while Rosabe sunk upon her uncle's bosom, and wept bi
-ly.

Chap. III.—The Midnight Meeting.

"Victory!" shouted Parozzi, as he rushed into the Cardinal Gonzaga's chamber, where the chief conspirators were all assembled; "our work goes on bravely! Flodoardo returned this morning to Venice, and Abællino has already received the required sum."

Gonzaga.—Flodoardo does not want talents; I had rather he should live and join our party. He is seldom off his guard.

Parozzi.—Such vagabonds may well be cautious; they must not forget themselves, who have so much to conceal from others.

Falieri.—Rosabella, as I understand, by no means sees this Florentine with unfavorable eyes.

Parozzi.—Oh! wait till to-morrow, and then he may make love to the devil and his grandmother, if he likes.—Abællino by that time will have wrung his neck round, I warrant you!

Contarino.—It is strange, that in spite of all inquiries, I can learn but little at Florence respecting this Flodoardo. My letters inform me that some time ago there did exist a family of that name; but it has been long extinct, or if any of its descendants are still in being at Florence, their existence is quite a secret.

Gonzaga.—You are all invited to the Doge's to-morrow

Contarino.—That is well; it seems that my recommendations have obtained some weight with him, since his triumvirate has been removed. And in the evening a masked ball is to be given; did not the Doge's Chamberlain say so?

Falieri.—He did.

Memmo.—I only hope there is no trick in all this. If he should have been given an hint of our conspiracy—Mercy on us! my teeth chatter at the thought.

Gonzaga.—Absurd! by what means should our designs have been made known to him? The thing is impossible.

Memmo.—Impossible? What! when there's scarce a cut-purse, house-breaker, or vagabond in Venice, who has not been enlisted in our service, would it be so strange if the Doge discovered a little of the business? A secret which is known to so many, how should it escape his penetration?

Contarino.—Simpleton! the same thing happens to him which happens to betrayed husbands: every one can see the horns, except the man who carries them. And yet I confess it is full time that we should realize our projects, and prevent the possibility of our being betrayed.

Falieri.—You are right, friend; everything is ready, and now the sooner that the blow is struck, the better.

Parozzi.—Nay, the discontented populace, which at present sides with us, would be rfectly well pleased if the sport began this ry night; delay the business longer, and ir anger against Andreas will cool, and der them unfit for our purposes.

Contarino.—Then let us decide the game once; be to-morrow the important day! Leave the Doge to my disposal; I'll at least engage to bury my poniard in his heart, and then let the business end as it may, one of two things must happen; either we shall rescue ourselves from all trouble and vexation, by throwing every thing into uproar and confusion, or else we shall sail with a full wind from this cursed world to another.

Perozzi.—Mark me, friends; we must go armed to the Doge's entertainment.

Gonzaga.—All the members of the College of Ten have been particularly invited.

Falieri.—Down with every man of them!

Memmo.—Aye, aye! fine talking! but suppose it should turn out to be "down with ourselves?"

Falieri.—Thou white livered wretch! Stay at home then, and take care of your worthless existence—but if our attempt succeeds, come not to us to reimburse you for the sums which you have already advanced. Not a sequin shall be paid you back, depend on't.

Memmo.—You wrong me, Falieri; if you wish to prove my courage, draw your sword and measure it against mine! I am as brave as yourself; but thank heaven, I am not quite so hot headed.

Gonzaga.—Nay, even suppose that the event should not answer our expectations, Andreas once dead, let the populace storm if it pleases; the protection of his Holiness will sanction our proceedings.

Memmo.—The Pope? May we count on his protection?

Gonzaga, (throwing him a letter.)—Read there, unbeliever; the Pope, I tell you, must protect us, since one of our objects is professed to be the assertion of the rights of St. Peter's chair in Venice. Pr'ythee, Memmo, teaze us no more with such doubts, but let Contarino's proposal be adopted at once. Our confederates must be summoned to Parozzi's palace with all diligence, and there furnished with such weapons as are necessary. Let the stroke of midnight be the signal for Contarino's quitting the ball-room and hastening to seize the arsenal; Salvitti, who commands there, is in our interest, and will throw open the gates upon the first summons.

Falieri.—The admiral Adorno, as soon as he hears the alarm-bell, will immediately lead his people to our assistance.

Parozzi.—Oh! our success is certain.

Contarino.—Only let us take care to make the confusion as general as possible; our adversaries must be kept in the dark who are their friends, and who are their foes; and but our own party must be left ignorant the authors, origin, and object of t r.

Parozzi.—By heaven, I am delighted at finding the business at length so near the moment of execution.

Falieri.—Parozzi, have you distributed the white ribbands, by which we are to recognize our partizans?

Parozzi.—That was done some days ago.

Contarino.—Then there is no more necessary to be said on the subject. Comrades, fill your goblets! We will not meet again together till our work has been completed.

Memmo.—And yet methinks it would not be unwise to consider the matter over again coolly.

Contarino.—Psha! consideration and prudence have nothing to do with a rebellion: despair and rashness in this case are better counsellors. The work once begun, the constitution of Venice once boldly overturned, so that no one can tell who is master and who is subject, then consideration will be of service in instructing us how far it may be necessary for our interests to push the confusion.—Come, friends! fill, fill, I say!—I cannot help laughing when I reflect, that by giving this entertainment to-morrow, the Doge himself kindly affords us an opportunity of executing our plans.

Parozzi.—As to Flodoardo, I look upon him as already in his grave; yet before we go to-morrow to the Doge's, it will be as well to have a conference with Abællino.

Contarino.—That care we will leave t

you, Parozzi; and in the meanwhile here's the health of Abællino!

All.—Abællino!

Gonzaga.—And success to our enterprise to-morrow.

Memmo.—I'll drink that toast with all my heart.

All.—Success to to-morrow's enterprise!

Parozzi.—The wine tastes well, and every face looks gay. Pass eight-and forty hours, and shall we look as gaily?—We separate smiling; shall we smile when two nights hence we meet again?—No matter.

CHAP. IV.—The decisive Day.

The next morning every thing in Venice seemed as tranquil as if nothing more than ordinary was on the point of taking place, and yet since her first foundation, never had a more important day rose on the republic.

The inhabitants of the ducal palace were in motion early. The impatient Andrea forsook the couch on which he had passed a sleepless and anxious night, as soon as the first sunbeams penetrated through the lattice of his chamber. Rosabella had employed the hours of rest on dreams of Flodoardo, and she still seemed to be dreaming of him even after sleep was fled. Camilla's love for her fair pupil had broken her repose

she loved Rosabella as had she been her daughter, and was aware that on this interesting day depended the love-sick girl's whole future happiness. For some time Rosabella was unusually gay; she sang to her harp the most lively airs, and jested with Camilla for looking so serious and so uneasy; but when mid-day approached, her spirits began to forsake her. She quitted her instrument, and paced the chamber with unsteady steps. With every succeeding hour her heart palpitated with greater pain and violence, and she trembled in expectation of the scene which was soon to take place.

The most illustrious persons in Venice already filled her uncle's palace; the afternoon, so much dreaded and yet so much desired, was come; and the Doge now desired Camilla to conduct his neice to the great saloon, where she was expected with impatience by all those who were of most consequence in the republic.

Rosabella sank on her knees before a statue of the Virgin. "Blessed Lady," she exclaimed with lifted hands, "have mercy on me! let all to day end well!"

Pale as death did she enter the chamber which, on the day before, she had acknowledged her love for Flodoardo, and he had sworn to risk his life to obtain her.—Flodoardo was not yet arrived.

The assembly was brilliant, the conversation very gay. They talked over the politics of the day, and discussed the various occurrences of Europe. The Cardinal and Contarino were engaged in a conference with the Doge, while Memmo, Parozzi and Falieri, stood silent together, and revolved the projects whose execution were to take place at midnight.

The weather was dark and tempestuous. The wind roared among the waters of the canal, and the vanes of the palace-towers creaked shrilly and discordantly. One storm of rain followed hard upon another.

The clock struck four. The cheeks of Rosabella, if possible, became paler than before. Andreas whispered somewhat to his chamberlain. In a few minutes the tread of armed men seemed approaching the door of the saloon, and soon after the clattering of weapons was heard.

Instantly a sudden silence reigned through the whole assembly. The young courtiers broke off their love-speeches abruptly, and the ladies stopped in their criticisms upon the last new fashions. The statesmen dropped their political discussions, and gazed on each other in silence and anxiety.

The Doge advanced slowly into the midst of the assembly. Every eye was fixed upon him. The hearts of the conspirators beat painfully.

"Be not surprised, my friends," said Andreas, "at these unusual precautions; they [illegible]

the pleasures of this society. You have all heard but too much of the Bravo Abællino, the murderer of the procurator Conari, and of my faithful counsellors Manfrone and Lomellino, and to whose dagger my illustrious guest, the prince of Monaldeschi, has but lately fallen a victim. The miscreant, the object of aversion to every honest man in Venice, to whom nothing is sacred or venerable, and who has hitherto set at defiance the whole vengeance of the republic—before another hour expires, perhaps this outcast of hell may stand before you in this very saloon.

All, (astonished.)—Abællino?—What! the bravo Abællino?

Gonzaga.—Of his own accord?

Andreas.—No; not of his own accord, in truth; but Flodoardo of Florence has undertaken to render this important service to the republic, to seize Abællino, cost what it may, and conduct him hither at the risk of his life.

A Senator.—The engagement will be difficult to fulfil. I doubt much Flodoardo's keeping his promise.

Another.—But if he should perform it, the obligation which Flodoardo will lay upon the republic will not be trifling.

A Third.—Nay, we shall all be his debtors, nor do I know how we can reward Flodoardo for so important a service.

Andreas.—Be that my task. Flodoardo has demanded my neice in marriage; if he performs his promise, Rosabella shall be his reward.

All gazed on each other in silence, some with looks expressing the most heart-felt satisfaction, and others with glances of envy and surprise

Fulieri, (in a low voice.)—Parozzi, how will this end?

Memmo.—As I live, the very idea makes me shake as if I had a fever.

Parozzi, (smiling contemptuously.)—It is very likely that Abællino should suffer himself to be caught!

Contarino.—Pray inform me, Signors, have any of you ever met this Abællino face to face?

Several Noblemen at once.—Not I! never!

A Senator.—He is a kind of spectre, who only appears now and then, when he is least expected and desired.

Rosabella.—I saw him once—never shall I forget the monster!

Andreas.—And my interview with him is too well known to make it needful for me to relate it.

Memmo.—I have heard a thousand stories about this miscreant, the one more wonderful than the other; and for my own part, I verily believe that he is Satan himself in a human form. I must say, that I think it would be wiser not to let him be brought among us, for he is capable of strangling is all as we stand here, one after another, without mercy!

"Gracious heaven!" screamed several of the ladies; "you don't say so? What! strangle us in this very chamber?"

Contarino.—The principal point is whether Flodoardo will get the better of him, or he of Flodoardo: now I would lay a heavy wager, that the Florentine will return without having finished the business.

A Senator.—And I would engage, on the contrary, that there is but one man in Venice who is capable of seizing Abællino, and that man is Flodoardo of Florence. The moment that I became acquainted with him, I prophesied that one day or other he would play a brilliant part in the annals of history.

Another Senator.—I think with you, signor: never was I so much struck with a man at first sight, as I was with Flodoardo.

Contarino.—A thousand sequins on Abællino's not being taken—unless death should have taken him first.

The first Senator.—A thousand sequins on Flodoardo's seizing him—

Andreas.—And delivering him up to me, either alive or dead.

Contarino.—Illustrious Signors, you are witnesses of the wager.—My Lord Vitalba, there is my hand on it—a thousand sequins!

The Senator.—Done!

Contarino, (smiling.)—Many thanks for your gold, signor: I look on it as already in my purse. Flodoardo is a clever gentleman, no doubt; yet I would advise him to take good care of himself, for he will find that Abællino knows a trick or two, or I am much mistaken.

Gonzaga.—May I request your highness to inform me, whether Flodoardo is attended by the sbirri?

Andreas.—No, he is alone; near four and twenty hours have elapsed since he set out in pursuit of the Bravo.

Gonzaga, (to Contarino, with a smile of triumph.)—I wish you joy of your thousand sequins, signor.

Contarino, (bowing respectfully.)—Since your Excellency prophesies it, I can no longer doubt my success.

Memmo.—I begin to recover myself! Well, well! Let us see the end.

Three and twenty hours had elapsed since Flodoardo had entered into his rash engagement—the four and twentieth now hastened to its completion; and yet Flodoardo came not.

CHAP. V.—The Clock strikes five!

The Doge became uneasy. The Senator Vitalba began to tremble for his thousand sequins, and the conspirators could not restrain their spiteful laughter when Conta-rino gravely declared that he would gladly lose not one thousand sequins, but twenty, if the loss of his wager through Abællino's being captured might but secure the general safety of the republic.

"Hark!" cried Rosabella, "the clock strikes five."

All listened to the chimes in the tower of St. Mark's church, and trembled as they counted the strokes. Had not Camilla supported her, Rosabella would have sank upon the floor. The destined hour was past, and still Flodoardo came not!

The venerable Andreas felt a sincere affection for the Florentine: he shuddered as he dwelt upon the probability that Abællino's dagger had prevailed.

Rosabella advanced towards her uncle as if she would have spoken to him; but anxiety fettered her tongue, and tears forced themselves into her eyes. She struggled for a while to conceal her emotions, but the effort was too much for her. She threw herself on a sofa, wrang her hands, and prayed to the God of mercy for help and comfort.

The rest of the company either formed groups of whisperers, or strolled up and down the apartment in evident uneasiness. They would willingly have appeared gay and unconcerned, but they found it impossible to assume even an affectation of gaiety; and thus elapsed an hour, hour, and still Flodoardo came not.

At that moment the evening sun broke through the clouds, and a ray of its sitting glory was thrown full upon the countenance of Rosabella. She started from the sofa, extended her arms towards the radiant orb, and exclaimed, while a smile of hope played round her lips, "God is merciful! God will have mercy too on me!"

Contarino.—Was it at five o'clock that Flodoardo engaged to produce Abællino? It is now a full hour beyond his time.

Vitalbn.—Let him only produce him at last, and he may be an hour beyond his time, if he chooses.

Andreas.—Hark!—No! Silence! surely I hear footsteps approaching the saloon!

The words were scarcely spoken when the folding doors were thrown open, and Flodoardo rushed into the room, enveloped in his mantle. His hair streamed in the air in wild disorder; a deep shade was thrown over his face by the drooping plumes of his barrette, from which the rain was flowing; extreme melancholy was impressed on all his features; and he threw his gloomy looks around him, as he bowed his head in salutation of the assembly.

Every one crouded round him; every mouth was unclosed to question him; every eye was fixed on his face, as eager to anticipate his answers.

"Holy Virgin!" exclaimed Memmo, "I —— afraid that——"

"Be silent, Signor!" interrupted Contarino, sternly; "there is nothing to be afraid of."

"Illustrious Venetians!" it was thus that Flodoardo at length broke silence, and he spoke with the commanding tone of a hero; "I conclude that his Highness has already made known to you the object of your being thus assembled. I come to put an end to your anxiety; but first, noble Andreas, I must once more receive the assurance that Rosabella of Corfu shall become my bride, provided I deliver into your power the Bravo Abællino."

Andreas, (examining his countenance with extreme anxiety.)—Flodoardo, have you succeeded? Is Abællino your prisoner?

Flodoardo.—If Abællino is my prisoner, shall Rosabella be my bride?

Andreas.—Bring me Abællino, alive or dead, and she is yours—I swear it beyond the power of retracting, and swear also that her dowry shall be royal!

Flodoardo.—Illustrious Venetians, ye have heard the Doge's oath.

All.—We are your witnesses.

Flodoardo, (advancing a few paces with a bold air, and speaking with a firm voice.)—Well then, Abællino is in my power—is in yours.

All, (in confusion and a kind of uproar.)—In ours? merciful Heaven!—Where is he? Abællino?

Andreas.—Is he dead or living?

Flodoardo.—He still lives.

Gonzaga, (hastily.)—He lives?

Flodoardo, (bowing to the Cardinal respectfully.)—He still lives, Signor!

Rosabella, (pressing Camilla to her bosom.)—Didst thou hear that, Camilla? Didst thou hear it?—The villain still lives! not one drop of blood has stained the innocent hand of Flodoardo.

Vitalba.—Signor Contarino, I have won a thousand sequins of you.

Contarino.—So it should seem, Signor!

Andreas.—My son, you have bound the republic to you for ever, and I rejoice that it is to Flodoardo that she is indebted for a service so essential.

Vitalba.—And permit me, noble Florentine, to thank you for this heroic act in the name of the Senate of Venice. Our first care shall be to seek out a reward proportioned to your merits

Flodoardo, (extending his arm towards Rosabella with a melancholy air.)—There stands the only reward for which I wish.

Andreas, (joyfully.) And that reward is your own. But where have you left the blood-hound? Conduct him hither, my son, and let me look on him once more. When last I saw him, he had the insolence to tell me—"Doge, I am your equal: this narrow chamber now holds the two greatest men in Venice."—Now then let me see what is other great man looks in captivity.

Two or three Senators.—Where is he? Bring him hither!

Several of the ladies screamed at hearing this proposal. "For heaven's sake!" cried they, "keep the monster away from us! I shall be frightened out of my senses if he comes here!"

"Noble ladies," said Flodoardo with a smile expressing rather sorrow than joy, "you have nothing to apprehend. Abællino shall do you no harm; but he needs must come hither, to claim 'the Bravo's Bride,' " and he pointed at Rosabella.

"O, my best friend!" she answered, "how shall I express my thanks to you for having thus put an end to my terrors? I shall now tremble no more at hearing Abællino named; Rosabella shall now be called 'the Bravo's Bride' no longer.

Falieri.—Is Abællino already in this palace?

Flodoardo.—He is.

Vitalba.—Then why do you not produce him?—Why do you trifle so long with our impatience?

Flodoardo.—Be patient. It is now time that the play should begin. Be seated, noble Andreas—let all the rest arrange themselves behind the Doge. Abællino's coming.

At that word, both old and young, both male and female, with the rapidity of lightning, flew to take shelter behind Andreas. Every heart beat anxiously; but as to the conspirators, while expecting Abællino's appearance, they suffered the torments of the damned.

Grave and tranquil sat the Doge in his chair, like a judge appointed to pass sentence on this King of the banditti. The spectators stood around in various groupes, all hushed and solemn as if waiting to receive their final judgment. The lovely Rosabella, with all the security of angels, whose innocence has nothing to fear, reclined her head on Camilla's shoulder, and gazed on her heroic lover with looks of adoration. The conspirators, with pallid cheeks and staring eyes, filled up the back ground; and a dead and awful silence prevailed through the assembly.

"And now then," said Flodoardo, "prepare yourselves—for this terrible Abællino shall appear before you! Do not tremble; he shall do one harm."

With these words he turned away from the company, and advanced towards the folding doors; he paused for a few moments, and concealed his face in his cloak.

"Abællino!" cried he at length, raising his head, and extending his arm towards the door. At that name all who heard it shuddered involuntarily, and Rosabella advanced unconsciously a few steps towards her lover. She trembled at the Bravo's appearance, yet trembled more for Flodoardo than herself.

"Abællino!" the Florentine repeated in a loud and angry tone, threw from him his mantle and barrette, and had already laid his hand on the lock of the door to open it when Rosabella uttered a cry of terror!—"Stay, Flodoardo!" she cried, rushing towards him, and—Ha! Flodoardo was gone and there, in his place, stood Abællino, and shouted out—"Ho! ho!"

Chap. VI.—Apparitions.

Instantly a loud cry of terror resounded through the apartment. Rosabella sank fainting at the Bravo's feet; the conspirators were almost suffocated with rage, terror and astonishment; the ladies made signs of the cross, and began in all haste to repeat their pater nosters; the senators stood rooted to their places like so many statues, and the Doge doubted the information of his ears and eyes.

Calm and terrible stood the Bravo before them, in all the pomp of his strange and awful ugliness; with his Bravo's habit, his girdle filled with pistols and poniards, his distorted yellow countenance, his black and bushy eye brows, his lips convulsed, his right eye covered by a large patch, and his left half buried among the wrinkles of flesh which swelled around it. He gaze him for a few moments in silence, and then approached the stupified Andreas.

"Ho! ho!" he roared in a voice like thunder, "you wished to see the Bravo Abællino?—Doge of Venice, here he stands, and is come to claim his bride!"

Andreas gazed with looks of horror on this model for demons, and at length stammered out with difficulty, "It cannot be real—I must surely be the sport of some horrible dream!"

"Without there! Guards!" exclaimed the Cardinal Gonzaga, and would have hastened to the folding doors; when Abællino put his back against them, snatched a pistol from his girdle, and pointed it at the Cardinal's bosom.

"The first," cried he, "who calls for the guard, or advances one step from the place on which he stands, expires that moment. Fools! do you think I would have delivered myself up, and desired that guards might beset these doors, had I feared their swords, or intended to escape from your power?—No—I am content to be your prisoner, but not through compulsion. I am content to be your prisoner, and it was with that intent that I came hither. No mortal should have the glory of seizing Abællino; if justice ired him to be delivered up, it was ary that he should be delivered up self. Or do you take Abællino for mary ruffian, who passes his time in skulking from the sbirri, and who murders for the sake of despicable plunder? No, by heaven, no! Abællino was no such common villain. It is true I was a Bravo; but the motives which induced me to become one were great and striking."

Andreas, (clasping his hands together.)—Almighty God! can this be possible?

An awful silence again reigned through the saloon. All trembled while they listened to the voice of the terrible assassin, who strode through the chamber, proud and majestic as the monarch of the infernal world.

Rosabella opened her eyes; their first look fell upon the Bravo. "Oh! God of mercy!" she exclaimed, "he is still there!—Methought too that Flodoardo—no, no—it could not be! I was deceived by witchcraft!

Abællino advanced towards her, and attempted to raise her. She shrunk from his touch with horror.

"No, Rosabella," said the Bravo in an altered tone, "what you saw was no illusion. Your favored Flodoardo is no other than Abællino the Bravo."

"It is false!" interrupted Rosabella, starting from the ground in despair, and throwing herself for refuge on Camilla's bosom; "Monster, thou canst not be Flodoardo—such a fiend can never have been such a seraph! Flodoardo's actions were and glorious as a demi-god's! 'twe that I learnt to love good and glorious actions, and it was he who encouraged me to attempt them myself! His heart was pure from all mean passions, and capable of conceiving all great designs! Never did he scruple in the cause of virtue to endure fatigue and pain, and to dry up the tears of suffering innocence—that was Flodoardo's proudest triumph! Flodoardo and thou,—wretch, whom many a bleeding ghost has long since accused before the throne of Heaven, dare not thou to profane the name of Flodoardo."

Abællino, (proud and earnest.)—Rosabella, wilt thou forsake me? Wilt thou retract thy promise? Look, Rosabella, and be convinced: I, the Bravo, and thy Flodoardo are the same.

He said, removed the patch from his eye, and passed an handkerchief over his face once or twice: in an instant his complexion was altered—his bushy eye-brows and straight black hair disappeared, his features were replaced in their natural symmetry, and lo! the handsome Florentine stood before the whole assembly, dressed in the habit of the Bravo Abællino.

Abællino.—Mark me, Rosabella! Seven times over, and seven times again, will I change my appearance, even before your eyes, and that so artfully, that, study me as you will, the tran-formation shall still de-ou. But change as I may, of one thing be assured—I am the man whom you loved as Flodoardo.

The Doge gazed and listened without being able to recover from his confusion; but every now and then the words, "Dreadful! dreadful!" escaped from his lips, and he wrang his hands in agony. Abællino approached Rosabella, and said in a tone of supplication, "Rosabella, wilt thou break thy promise? Am I no longer dear to thee?"

Rosabella was unable to answer; she stood like one chained to a statue, and fixed her motionless eyes on the Bravo.

Abællino took her cold hand, and pressed it to his lips. "Rosabella," said he, "art thou still mine?"

Rosabella.—Flodoardo—O! that I had never loved—had never seen thee!

Abællino.—Rosabella, wilt thou still be the bride of Flodoardo? wilt thou be 'the Bravo's bride?'

Love struggled with abhorrence in Rosabella's bosom, and painful was the contest.

Abællino.—Hear me, beloved one! It was for thee that I have discovered myself—that I have delivered myself into the hands of justice! For thee? Oh! what would I not do for thee?—Rosabella, I wait but to hear one syllable from your lips! speak but a decisive 'yes!' or 'no!' and all is ended!—Rosabella, dost thou love me still?

And still she answered not; but she th- upon him a look innocent and tender aseamed from the eye of an angel, and that look betrayed but too plainly that the miscreant was still master of her heart. She turned from him hastily, threw herself into Camilla's arms, and exclaimed, "God forgive you, man, for torturing me so cruelly!"

The Doge had by this time recovered from his stupor: he started from his chair; threats flashed from his eyes, and his lips trembled with passion. He rushed towards Abællino; but the senators threw themselves in his passage, and held him back by force. In the mean while the Bravo advanced towards him with the most insolent composure, and requested him to calm his agitation. "Doge of Venice," said he, "will you keep your promise? That you gave it to me, these noble lords and ladies can testify."

Andreas.—Monster! Miscreant!—oh! how artfully has this plan been laid to ensnare me!—Tell me, Venetians; to such a creditor am I obliged to discharge my fearful debt! Long has he been playing a deceitful, bloody part; the bravest of our citizens have fallen beneath his dagger, and it was the price of their blood which has enabled him to act the nobleman in Venice. Then comes he to me in the disguise of a man of honour, seduces the heart of my unfortunate Rosabella, obtains my promise by an artful trick, and now claims the maiden for his bride, in the hope that the husband of the Doge's niece will easily obtain an absolution for his crimes. Tell me, Venetians, ought I to keep my word with this miscreant?

Senators.—No! no! by no means!

Abællino, (with solemnity.)—If you have once pledged your word, you ought to keep it, though given to the Prince of darkness. Oh! fie! fie! Abællino, how shamefully hast thou been deceived in thy reckoning. I thought I had to do with men of honour—Oh! how grossly have I been mistaken! (In a terrible voice,) Once again, and for the last time, I ask you, Doge of Venice, wilt thou break thy princely word?

Andreas, (in a tone of authority.)—Give up your arms.

Abællino.—And you will really withhold from me my just reward? Shall it be in vain that I delivered Abællino into your power?

Andreas.—It was to the brave Flodoardo that I promised Rosabella; I never entered into an engagement with the murderer Abællino. Let Flodoardo claim my neice, and she is his; but Abællino can have no claim to her. Again I say, lay down your arms.

Abællino, (laughing wildly.)—The murderer Abællino, say you? Ho! ho! Be it your care to keep your promises, and trouble not yourself about my murders—they are my affair, and I warrant I shall find a word or two to say in defence of them when the judgment day arrives.

Gonzaga, (to the Doge.)—What dreadful

Abœllino.—Oh! good lord Cardinal, intercede in my behalf. You know me well; I have always acted by you like a man of honor, that at least you cannot deny!—Say one word in my favor then, good lord Cardinal!

Gonzaga, (angrily, and with imperious dignity.)—Address not thyself to me, miscreant! What canst thou and I have to do together? Venerable Andreas, delay no longer; let the guards be called in!

Abœllino.—What? Is there then no hope for me? Does no one feel compassion for the wretched Abællino? What! no one?—(A pause.)—All are silent?—all!——It is enough! Then my fate is decided—call in your guards!

Rosabella, (with a scream of agony, springing forward, and falling at the Doge's feet.)—Mercy! mercy!—pardon him—pardon Abællino!

Abœllino, (in rapture.)—Sayest thou so?—Ho! ho! then an angel prays for Abællino in his last moments!

Rosabella, (clasping the Doge's knees.)—Have mercy on him, my friend! my father! He is a sinner—but leave him to the justice of heaven! He is a sinner—but oh! Rosabella loves him still.

Andreas, (pushing her away with indignation.)—Away, unworthy girl! you rave.

Abællino folded his arms, gazed with erness on what was passing, and tears

gushed into his brilliant eyes. Rosabella caught the Doge's hand, as he turned to leave her, kissed it twice, and said, "If you have no mercy on him, then have none on me! The sentence which you pass on Abællino will be mine; it is for my own life that I plead as well as Abællino's—father! dear father! reject not my suit, but spare him!

Andreas, (in an angry and decided tone.)—Abællino dies!

Abællino.—And can you look on with dry eyes, while that innocent dove bleeds at your feet? Go, barbarian; you never loved Rosabella as she deserved; now she is yours no longer—she is mine, she is Abællino's!

He raised her from the ground, and pressed her pale lips against his own.

"Rosabella, thou art mine; death alone parts us. Thou lovest me as I would be loved; I am blest whate'er may happen, and can now set fortune at defiance. To business then!"

He replaced Rosabella, who was almost fainting, on the bosom of Camilla, then advanced into the middle of the chamber, and addressed the assembly with an undaunted air:

"Venetians, you are determined to deliver me up to the axe of justice! there is for me no hope of mercy? 'Tis well! act as you please; but ere you sit in judgment over me, Signors, I shall take the liberty of passing sentence upon some few of you.

mark me! you see in me the murderer of Conari! the murderer of Paolo Manfroni! the murderer of Lomellino! I deny it not. But would you know the illustrious persons who paid me for the use of my dagger?"

With these words he put a whistle to his lips, and sounded it, and instantly the doors flew open, the guards rushed in, and, ere they had time to recollect themselves, the chief conspirators were in custody, and disarmed.

"Guard them well!" said Abællino, in a terrible voice to the sentinels; "you have your orders. Noble Venetians, look on these villains—it is to them that you are indebted for the loss of your three noblest citizens. I accuse of these murders, one, two, three, four; and my good lord Cardinal there has the honor to be the fifth."

Motionless and bewildered stood the accused; tale-telling confession spoke in every feature that the charge was true, and no one was bold enough to contradict Abællino.

"What can all this mean?" asked the senators of each other, in the utmost surprise and confusion.

"This is all a shameful artifice," the Cardinal at length contrived to say; "the villain, perceiving that he has no chance of escaping punishment, is willing, out of mere resentment, to involve us in his destruction."

Contarino, (recovering himself.)—In the edness of his life he has surpassed all former miscreants, and now he is trying to surpass them in the wickedness of his death.

Abœllino, (with majesty.)—Be silent! I know your whole plot, have seen your list of proscriptions, am well informed of your whole arrangement, and, at the moment that I speak to you, the officers of justice are employed, by my orders, in seizing the gentlemen with the white ribbons round their arms, who this very night intended to overturn Venice.—Be silent, for defence were vain.

Andreas, (in astonishment.)—Abællino, what is the meaning of all this?

Abœllino.—Neither more nor less than that Abællino has discovered and defeated a conspiracy against the constitution of Venice, and the life of its Doge! The Bravo, in return for your kind intention of sending him to destruction in a few hours, has preserved you from it.

Vitalba, (to the accused.)—Noble Venetians, you are silent under this heavy charge?

Abœllino.—They are wise, for no defence could now avail them. Their troops are already disarmed and lodged in separate dungeons of the state prison: visit them there, and you will learn more. You now understand, probably, that I did not order the doors of the saloon to be guarded for the purpose of seizing the terrible Bravo Abællino, but of taking those heroes into secure custody. And now, Venitian pare together your conduct and mine! At the hazard of my life have I preserved the state from ruin; disguised as a Bravo I dared to enter the assembly of these ruth-less villains whose daggers laid Venice waste; I have endured, for your sakes, storm and rain, and frost and heat; Venice owes to my care her constitution and your lives; and yet are my services deserving of no reward? All this have I done for Rosabella of Corfu, and yet will you withhold from me my promised bride? I have saved you from death, have saved the honor of your wives from the polluter's kiss, and the throats of your innocent children from the knife of the assassin.—Men! men! and yet will you send me to the scaffold? Look on this list! See how many among you would have bled!—Read you not in every feature that they are already condemned by heaven and their own conciences? Does a single mouth unclose itself in exculpation? Does a single movement of the head give the lie to my charge? Yet the truth of what I have advanced shall be made still more evident."

He turned himself to the conspirators:—"Mark me!" said he, "the first among you who acknowledges the truth, shall receive a free pardon. I swear it, I, the Bravo Abællino!"

The conspirators remained silent. Sud-Memmo started forward, and threw trembling at the Doge's feet. "Venetians!" he exclaimed, "Abællino has told you true."

"'Tis false! 'tis false!" exclaimed the accused altogether.

"Silence!" cried Abællino in a voice of thunder, while indignation which flamed in every feature struck terror into his hearers; "silence, I say, and hear me—or rather hear the ghosts of your victims!—Appear! appear!" cried this dreadful man in a tone still louder, "it is time."

Again he sounded his whistle; the folding doors were thrown open, and there stood the Doge's so much lamented friends, Conari, Lomellino and Manfrone.

"We are betrayed!" shouted Contarino, drew out a concealed dagger, and plunged it in his bosom up to the very hilt.

And now what a scene of rapture followed. Tears streamed down the silver beard of Andreas as he rushed into the arms of his long-lost companions: tears bedewed the cheeks of the venerable triumvirate, as they once more clasped the knees of their prince, their friend, their brother. These excellent men, these heroes, never had Andreas hoped to meet them again till they should meet in heaven; and Andreas blest heaven for permitting him to meet them once more on earth. These four men, who had valued each other in the first dawn of youth, who had fought by each other's side in manhood, were now assembled in age, and valued each other more than ever. The spectators gazed with universal interest on the scene before them; and the good old senators mingled tears of joy with those shed by the re-united companions. In the happy delirium of this moment, nothing but Andreas and his friends was attended to; no one was aware that the conspirators and the self-murderer, Contarino, were removed by the guards from the saloon; no one but Camilla observed Rosabella, who threw herself sobbing on the bosom of the handsome Bravo, and repeated, a thousand times, "Abællino is then not a murderer."

At length they began to recollect themselves—they looked round them—and the first words which broke from every lip were, "Hail, savior of Venice!" The roof rang with the name of Abællino, and unnumbered blessings accompanied the name.

That very Abællino, who, not an hour before, had been doomed to the scaffold, by the whole assembly, now stood calm and dignified as a god before the adoring spectators; and now he viewed, with complacency, the men whose lives he had saved, and now his eye dwelt with rapture on the woman whose love was the reward of all his dangers.

"Abællino!" said Andreas, advancing to the Bravo, and extending his hand towards him.

"I am not Abællino," replied he, smiling, while he prest the Doge's hand respectfully to his lips, "neither am I Flodoardo of Florence. I am by birth a Neapolitan, and by name Rosalvo; the death of my inveterate enemy, the Prince of Monaldeschi, makes it no longer necessary to conceal who I really am."

"Monaldeschi?" repeated Andreas with a look of anxiety.

"Fear not," continued Rosalvo, "Monaldeschi, it is true, fell by my hand, but fell in honorable combat. The blood which stained his sword flowed from my veins, and in his last moments conscience asserted her empire in his bosom. He died not till he had written, in his tablets, the most positive declaration of my innocence as to the crimes with which his hatred had contrived to blacken me; and he also instructed me by what means I might obtain, at Naples, the restoration of my forfeited estates and the re-establishment of my injured honor. Those means have been already efficacious, and all Naples is, by this time, informed of the arts by which Monaldeschi procured my banishment, and of the many plots which he laid for my destruction; plots, which made it necessary for me to drop my own character, and never to appear but in disguise. After various wanderings, chance led me to Venice; my appearance was so much altered that I dreaded not discovery—but I dreaded (and with reason) perishing in your streets with hunger. In this situation accident brought me acquainted with the banditti, by whom Venice was then infested. I willingly united myself to their society, partly with the view of purifying the republic from the presence of these wretches, and partly in the hope of discovering through them the more illustrious villains by whom their daggers were employed. I was successful; I delivered the banditti up to justice, and stabbed their captain in Rosabella's sight. I was now the only Bravo in Venice; every scoundrel was obliged to have recourse to me: I discovered the plans of the conspirators, and now you know them also. I found that the deaths of the Doge's three friends had been determined on; and in order to obtain full confidence with the confederates, it was necessary to persuade them that these men had fallen beneath my dagger. No sooner had my plan been formed, than I imparted it to Lomellino; he, and he only was my confidant in this business. He presented me to the Doge as the son of a deceased friend; he assisted me with his advice; he furnished me with keys to those doors of the public gardens which no one was permitted to pass through except Andreas and his particular friends, and which frequently enabled me to elude pursuit; he showed me several private passages in the palace, by which I could penetrate unobserved even into the Doge's bed-chamber.

When the time for his disappearance arrived, he not only readily consented to lie concealed in a retreat known only to ourselves, but was also the means of inducing Manfrone and Conari to join him in his retirement, till the fortunate issue of this day's adventure permitted me to set them once more at liberty. The banditti exist no longer; the conspirators are in chains, my plans are accomplished; and now, Venetians, if you still think him deserving of it, here stands the Bravo Abællino, and you may lead him to the scaffold when you will!"

"To the scaffold?" exclaimed at once the Doge, the senators, and the whole crowd of nobili; and every one burst into enthusiastic praises of the dauntless Neapolitan.

"Oh! Abællino," cried Andreas, while he wiped away a tear; "I would gladly give my ducal bonnet to be such a Bravo as thou hast been!—'Doge,' didst thou once say to me, 'thou and I are the two greatest men in Venice:' But oh! how much greater is the Bravo than the Doge! Rosabella is that jewel than which I have nothing in the world more precious; Rosabella is dearer to me than an emperor's crown; Rosabella is thine."

"Abællino!" said Rosabella, and extended her hand to the handsome Bravo.

"Triumph!" cried he; "Rosabella is the Bravo's bride!" and he clasped the blushing maid to his bosom.

CHAP. VII.—Conclusion.

And now it would be not at all amiss t make Count Rosalvo sit down quietly be tween the good old Doge and his lovel niece, and then cause him to relate the mo tive of Monaldeschi's hatred—in what man ner he lost Valeria—what crimes were im puted to him, and how he escaped from th assassins sent in pursuit of him by his ene my; how he had long wandered from plac to place, and how he had at length learn (during his abode in Bohemia with a gang of gypsies) such means of disguising his fea tures as enabled him to defy the keenes penetration to discover in the beggar Ab ællino the once admired Count Rosalvo how in this disguise he had returned to Ita ly; and how Lomellino, ascertaining that he was universally believed at Naples, to hav long since perished by shipwreck, (and therefore that neither the officers of the In quisition nor the assassins employed by hi enemy were likely to trouble themselve any more about him) he had ventured t resume, with some slight alterations, hi own appearance at Venice;—how the arri val of Monaldeschi had obliged him to conceal himself, till an opportunity offered of presenting himself to the Prince when unattended, and of demanding satisfaction for his injuries; how he had been himself

nded in several places by his antagonist, gh the combat finally terminated in his r; how he had resolved to make use of aldeschi's death to terrify Andreas still her, and of Parozzi's conspiracy to ob- Rosabella's hand of the Doge; how he trembled lest the heart of his mistress ld have been only captivated by the ntic appearance of the adventurer Flo- rdo, and have rejected him when known e the Bravo Abællino; how he had re- ed to make use of the terror inspired the assassin to put her love to the seve- trial; and how, had she failed in that l, he had determined to renounce the stant maid forever; with many other whys, and wherefores, which, not being plained, will, I doubt not, leave much of tale involved in mystery: but before I n Rosalvo's history, I must ask two tions—

irst, Do my readers like the manner in ch I relate adventures?

Secondly, If my readers do like my man- er of relating adventures, can I employ time better than in relating them?

When these questions are answered, I may sibly resume my pen. In the mean ile, Gentlemen and Ladies, good night, pleasant dreams attend you!